Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There is no doubt about that. What I desired to do and what I desired was to have a severance of the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that, and understands it now. Both of those motions can be made. There is no necessity for making both at once—that is, you are not compelled to—but one can file a motion to reconsider any time during the day on which the thing occurs or the next day, and you can let that motion hang up as long as you please, until the end of the Congress, the Chair thinks. The motion to lay upon the table cuts out debate. The motion to reconsider is debatable. In the confusion the Chair did not know, but supposed that what was desired was an opportunity to get at the matter to-day. A Member can undoubtedly make both motions.

There is one other matter to which the Chair wishes to direct attention. Two gentlemen suggested yesterday that the Constitution provided there must be a roll call on a constitutional amendment. It does not provide anything of the sort. Everybody was rising, however, and, without ruling on the matter, the Chair ordered the Clerk to call the roll, because there was no use wasting time about it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes upon the subject of the delegation of power to Congress over railroads, not to interfere with privileged business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal and the clearing up of business on the Speaker's table on Monday next he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS MONONGAHELA RIVER, W. VA.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 6176, to authorize the city of Fairmont to construct and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, in the State of West Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] is entitled to 45 minutes at this time. If he is agreeable to permitting the gentleman to bring this up at this time, the Chair will put the request.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman upon his assurance that it will not take over five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman state why there is urgency of taking this up instead of waiting until the Unanimous Consent Calendar could be called regularly.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that this bill is simply an extension of an act that was approved on the 17th day of April, 1916. Bonds were voted for the purpose of constructing the bridge, but because of a technical defect in the bond issue the city of Fairmont was unable to finance the project within a year following the approval of the act. Later the bonds were disposed of and the city began the construction of the bridge. The War Department stopped the construction on the ground that under the bridge law after a period of one year had elapsed from the approval of the original act, the bridge could not be constructed without an extension of time granted in a regular legal way. At the present time there is a force of men idle, and they will continue to be idle and can do nothing until the bill has been passed authorizing an extension of the time in which to construct the bridge.

This nonresident contracting firm is on the ground to do the work, but they can not proceed——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It involves, then, the payment of a lot of idle men unless this goes through?

Mr. NEELY. Precisely so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Fairmont, a municipal corporation under the laws of the State of West Virginia, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, in Marion County, W. Va., at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge authorized by the act of Congress approved April 17, 1916, to be built across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va., by the city of Fairmont, are hereby extended to one year and three years, respectively, from the 17th day of April, 1917.

"SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va."

On motion of Mr. NEELY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on next Monday. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina whether, Monday next being District day, the Committee on the District of Columbia will have any business before the House?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think it will, but we will meet on Monday because I understand the Committee on Indian Affairs will be ready to report their appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. And that bill will be taken up for consideration?

Mr. KITCHIN. It will be taken up on Tuesday. It will be introduced on Monday, and it has to go over for a day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

NOMINATIONS TO FILL VACANCIES.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk some nominations to fill vacancies on committees, and move their adoption.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report them.

The Clerk read as follows:

SWAGAR SHERLEY, of Kentucky, to be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

WILLIAM E. COX, of Indiana, to be a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

WILLIAM KETTNER, of California, to be a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SAMUEL W. BEAKES, of Michigan, to be a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

EARL H. BESHLIN, of Pennsylvania, to be a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and the Committee on Patents.

The following-named gentlemen to be members of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures:

CARL HAYDEN, of Arizona.
HENRY B. STEAGALL, of Alabama.
AUGUSTINE LONERGAN, of Connecticut.
TOM D. MCKEOWN, of Oklahoma.
EARL H. BESHLIN, of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other nominations? If not, the question will be on these.

The question was taken, and the nominations were agreed to.

INCREASE IN TWO COMMITTEES.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, the rules of the House provide that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shall be composed of 19 members and the Committee on the Territories shall be composed of 16 members. At the first of the session, in the printed document filed by the Clerk of the House, of the standing committees of the House there was given to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds 20 members and to the Committee on the Territories 17 members and, therefore, it appeared that there were more vacancies than there were on those two committees. In consequence of that, Mr. GILLETT, on the other side of the House, presented nominations filling the apparent vacancies as they appeared upon the printed document, so that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds now has one more than it was entitled to and the Committee on the Territories one more. As I said, he was misled by this printed document, and I therefore ask unanimous consent—I have conferred with the members of the Committee on Rules and Mr. GILLETT and others before preparing this resolution—for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 222.

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fifth Congress be, and they are hereby, amended so that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shall consist of 20 members and the Committee on the Territories of 17 members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] is recognized for 25 minutes.

INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE FOR PEACE.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks leave to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, on the 6th of December last I introduced the following resolution, namely:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 173) to initiate the organization of an international league to secure a durable peace.

Resolved, etc., That the Congress of the United States shall initiate the organization of an international league to secure a durable peace, and for that purpose shall, through the President of the United States, invite the representatives of the parliaments of all the countries now at war with the central powers to convene in joint conference, to be held at the city of Washington, D. C.

To the average man the phrase "international league" carries with it the idea of something vague, intangible, and infinitely distant. It has always seemed inconceivable that the nations of the world should be able to cooperate. The world's experience of the last three years has shown the contrary. To-day 21 nations, representing every race, every continent, every tongue, and every nationality, are engaged in a common and joint effort against four powers. We have in effect an international alliance, international cooperation, an international league. The thing that seemed a dream of dreamers has come to be true. The present world struggle is not a war between races. The Anglo-Saxon and the Teuton are of the same racial stock, although on opposite sides now.

The English language has probably one-third words of Germanic origin. Some of the States engaged in this war are not nations in any sense of the word, but are artificial States, such, for instance, as the State of Austro-Hungary, a conglomeration of nationalities and races, held together by force. It is not a war of races nor of nations, it is a war of the world against four powers, two of which are States and not nations.

The concrete problem which presents itself to us is, can we extend the principle of international cooperation, now shown by the war to be a practicable proposition, into the future? Can we extend its operation so that it will embrace the world, and can we extend it so that it should have as its primary and sole object to secure, as far as it is humanly possible, a durable peace? The four powers have so far been able to defy the rest of the world. But is it not primarily due to the fact that, with the exception of Russia, France, and England, each of the other allied powers entered the contest when it suited its own convenience? Does anybody doubt that had there been an international league to take simultaneous action against the invader of Serbia we would have been spared the present world tragedy? That a league to prevent the recurrence of war is desirable no one would dare dispute. No people on earth are for war. No man loves it, except perhaps a few savages, to be found here and there, who revert to the brute.

The normal state of mankind is peace. That it is desirable all the nations of the world and all religions agree. The fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man constitute one of the fundamental concepts of every religious system. The pity of it is that these sacred words have been used so long by those who render lip prayer only that the phrase has lost all meaning, and one is almost ashamed to utter the sentiment. I intend to prove that not only is it desirable to establish lasting order in the relations of peoples but that much progress has been made in the direction of finding the proposition a practicable one. Astonishing progress has been made. We find a gentleman of judicial mind, a former President of the United States, Mr. Taft, uniting on the proposition of the desirability and possibility of such a league with the most extreme of extreme types, the present leader of the Russian revolutionary movement, Trotsky, who has been denounced by the press as an impossible man. We find that in the French Republic an international association to secure peace is considered one of the most vital things for which the French people are fighting. To France the organization of a world association which shall insure permanent peace is a matter of life and death. Here we have a people of a noble and distinct civilization, a people who have made contributions to the world's progress, unequaled by any other nation, but numerically much smaller than their immediate neighbors. There are only 38,000,000 of them, and right near them is a nation, an intellectually and physically vigorous people, 70,000,000 strong, and offering in a physical sense a very serious menace to their existence. And as you read the proceedings of the French Chamber of Deputies you find that nothing touches them to the quick so much as the suggestion that this war may end without a permanent association for a league to secure peace.

Take the British labor movement. And, by the way, the British labor movement is wide-awake, intelligent, and alert. They dare say things, and they are listened to. It is they that are responsible for the recent candor of Lloyd George.

In the draft of a manifesto on the war aims of British labor made public in England on December 17, 1917, by the joint action of the parliamentary committee of the Trade Union Congress and the executive committee of the Labor Party they lay special stress on the immediate necessity of making it an essential part of the treaty of peace itself "that there shall be forthwith established a supernational authority or league of nations."

This manifesto anticipated Lloyd George's definite statement of war objects by 15 days.

The Socialists of Russia demand an international league. The Socialists of Germany demand an international league to secure peace. The Socialists of the world have always demanded it. They were always wise enough to see that, no matter how much progress a nation was making, no matter how rapidly it was advancing, that the life of the country and all its progress would be checked by a conflict with another nation. They considered democratic control of foreign and international relations just as vital and just as essential as popular rule in domestic affairs.

My first act as the Socialist Representative in the Sixty-fourth Congress was to suggest in a resolution, among the terms of peace, the formation of an international court of arbitration, with the commercial boycott as a means of punishment for disobedience.

A few days ago I received by mail a pamphlet called "War and Transportation," by Calvin Thomas, ex-commissioner of docks of New York City, containing an address made before the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce on December 11, 1917. Now, the last person in the world from whom I would expect any advanced ideas would be an official of the city of New York. [Laughter.] But here it is. In speaking before the Chamber of Commerce of Cleveland he says:

National sovereignty and international anarchy are interchangeable terms.

How bold! How radical! I take it that he means to say that the attempt by a nation to say to the rest of the world, "I want this done, and I care not at whose expense; I care not whom it may injure; I care not what nation may be adversely affected" amounts to international anarchy and that war is its culminating stage.

Let me come back to Mr. Taft's proposition of a league to enforce peace.

He proposes that the nations shall form an international league to enforce peace; that there shall be a court of arbitration and a council of conciliation; that the court of arbitration shall have the power to render a decision which shall be binding upon the litigants; that the council of conciliation, as its name implies, or a branch of the same court, shall have as its function the conciliation of the disputants.

He divides that court into two parts, for the reason that he divides the disputes which arise among nations into two classes. justiciable and nonjusticiable. Justiciable disputes among nations shall be submitted to arbitration. The nonjusticiable disputes to conciliation. From time to time this international league shall meet for the purpose of working out a code of procedure and to make international law.

That each of the member nations shall obligate itself to submit justiciable disputes to arbitration, and nonjusticiable disputes to conciliation.

That all member nations shall obligate themselves to punish any nation which shall refuse to submit a dispute either for arbitration or conciliation, as the case may require.

That the nations shall use their joint military and naval forces to punish the recalcitrant nation.

That is Mr. Taft's proposition. You will notice the distinction between justiciable and nonjusticiable disputes. He proceeds upon the theory that there are certain things that no nation can afford to permit other nations to question, and so far as that class of questions is concerned he would not have any nation submit to international authority. He would reserve the right to go to war in some cases.

It is evident that so far as the internal life of a nation is concerned no outside nation has any power to intervene or interfere, but whatever affects the intercourse or contact between nation and nation becomes a matter of international concern. It should be the very object and the very reason for the existence of such a league to assure to each nation full scope to live its own life unmolested.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Would you consider the question of duties upon imports as a question of international concern?

Mr. LONDON. Personally, in order to make my position clear, I want to say that I am a free trader. I believe in free trade among nations. Protective tariffs and punitive tariffs are barriers among the nations of the world. I would see international free trade. Just as we have free trade between the Pacific and Atlantic coasts of the United States, and just as this country has benefited by the abolition of tariff walls among the 48 States, just as free trade between the States has resulted in mutual benefit to the entire Union, just so would, in my opinion, the entire world be benefited by the abolition of tariffs. It is certainly in the interest of the nations to take up the question of tariffs. All reciprocity treaties and the "favored-nation" clause in present treaties are steps in the direction of uniformity in the commercial relations of nations.

I have dwelt so much on Mr. Taft's plan, which is, by the way, indorsed by a number of statesmen abroad, because it emphasizes the necessity of international cooperation, and not because I am in full agreement with his proposition.

The artificial theory that questions of national honor may be involved which can not be submitted to the judgment of the world, and that such questions are not judicable, is one of the most dangerous and prolific causes of conflict. Whenever there is a selfish design to be accomplished, it is usually covered up by the veil of national honor. I discussed this subject at length in one of my speeches delivered during the Sixty-fourth Congress.

The Taft plan fails to emphasize the necessity of disarmament, and as long as the nations maintain large armies and navies all treaties will be scraps of paper. As long as it will be within the power of any government to set in motion millions of armed men against any people, there will be "war and rumors of war." For the last three years the world has been trying to regain its balance and to offset the effect of the vicious blow inflicted during the first two months of the war by a powerful military machine. One of the principal objects of international cooperation must be to do away with armaments and militarism.

The present revolutionary Government of Russia in presenting its terms for universal peace demands that "peace conditions (are) to be settled by a peace congress composed of delegates chosen by national, representative bodies; diplomatists to bind themselves to sign no secret treaties, which are to be declared, by their nature, null and void" and "gradual disarmament on land and sea, and the reestablishment of militia to replace standing armies." I shall take up later their other demands.

Unfortunately, while the President of the United States has again and again urged the need of permanent international institutions to guarantee lasting peace and to reduce to the minimum the evil of armaments, the people of the United States and most of their representatives look upon these suggestions as a beautiful sentiment, a dream, which it will do no harm to indulge in, and not as a concrete, definite, and practical remedy for war.

The people fail to grasp the fact that when the President speaks of Alsace-Lorraine, of Belgium, and Serbia, and Roumania, of the readjustment of the frontiers of Italy, he speaks of world purposes and world problems; that while no treaties have been entered into, binding the United States as an ally, the old policy of isolation has been abandoned. America is in the midst of it. If the United States is not to initiate the organization of a world league to assure peace, who will? There is too much bitterness, too much hatred, there has been too much suffering on the other side of the Atlantic. They have seen too much blood.

An international congress, for the present to consist, of course, of the representatives of the parliaments of the allied countries—associates in the war—only, should be convoked without delay. With the President of the United States as the presiding officer, the conference would undertake the task of eliminating selfish national designs and of presenting the basic principles, the acceptance of which would entitle a nation to membership in a league of democratic nations.

I have promised to return to the demands of the Bolsheviki. The word "bolsheviki" is a newly coined Russian word. The Bolsheviki represent one of the two factions of the Social Democratic Party of Russia, and owe their name to the fact that at a certain party conference they were in a majority. Were we to create a corresponding English word, we would use the word "majoritists." Two groups outside of the social democrats are respectively designated by two words of Latin origin—Maximalists and Minimalists. Here are their demands, published in the New York World, by the way, the only paper, I think, that did publish them, with the exception of the New York Evening Post; so that most of the American people who read other papers are still under the impression that the international aims of the Bolsheviki represent an emanation from a lunatic asylum. Here are their demands:

(1) The evacuation of all Russian territory occupied by Germany, and autonomy for Poland and the Lithuanian and Lettish Provinces.
(2) Autonomy for Turkish Armenia.
(3) Settlement of the question of Alsace-Lorraine by plebiscite, with a guarantee of perfect freedom of vote.

A substantial group of the French Socialists take the same attitude. The refusal of the French Socialists to be represented in the last two cabinets is attributable to their moderation in the matter of Alsace-Loraine. The British Socialists also favor a referendum. My resolution of December 6, 1915, contained a similar provision.

(4) The restoration of Belgium and indemnity for damages to be provided by an international financial fund.
(5) The restoration of Serbia and Montenegro, with indemnity for damages to be taken out of a similar international fund. Serbia, moreover, to have access to the Adriatic; Bosnia and Herzegovina to have complete autonomy.
(6) Other contested territory in the Balkans to enjoy temporary autonomy until a plebiscite is taken.
(7) Roumania to recover all territory within her previous frontiers, after promising to grant autonomy to the Dobrudja and to give effect to article 3 of the Berlin convention concerning the equality of the rights of Jews—

Roumania still being the only country in the world that follows the medieval policy of denying to the Jewish people the rights accorded to people of every other faith.

Here the principle of religious toleration is considered too elementary to require restatement.

(8) Autonomy for the regions Treat and Trieste, inhabited by Italian populations, until a plebiscite is taken.
(9) Germany to receive back her colonies.

The colonies of Germany have a population of only 12,000,000 souls. The question of their possession does not justify the sacrifice of a single life.

(10) Restoration of Persia and Greece.

AGAINST U-BOAT WAR.

(11) Neutralization of all maritime straits leading to inland seas, including the canals of Suez and Panama; freedom of commercial navigation; the canceling of all charters during war time of enemy ships, and the torpedoing of commercial ships on the high seas to be forbidden by international agreement.
(12) All belligerents to renounce war indemnities under any form or disguise, and all contributions exacted since the beginning of the war to be refunded.
(13) All belligerents to renounce definitely any commercial boycott after the war or the institution of special customs and agreements—

And the two demands I previously referred to—

(14) Peace conditions to be settled by a peace congress composed of delegates chosen by national representative bodies; diplomatists to bind themselves to sign no secret treaties, which are to be declared, by their nature, null and void.
(15) Gradual disarmament on land and sea, and the reestablishment of militia to replace standing armies.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman please give the date when that appeared in that paper?

Mr. LONDON. It appeared on the 2d of January, 1918. I cut it from the New York Evening Post, which in a headline says, "The following cable dispatch was printed yesterday in the World."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That was before the President's message?

Mr. LONDON. Oh, yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And before Lloyd George's speech.

Mr. LONDON. Yes; before the President's message.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say that I have looked the papers over very carefully, and this is the first intimation I have had that there had been any such thing printed anywhere.

Mr. LONDON. It was printed in the New York World and in the New York Evening Post.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman give his idea as to how the Russian terms correspond with the terms of peace enunciated by the President in his recent address to Congress?

Mr. LONDON. I have compared them, and it appears to me that most of the terms are identical with the terms enunciated by the President. There are 15 conditions in the Russian statement. One of them is that reparation to Belgium should be at the expense of an international fund, while, so far as I can recall, the President's proposed terms omitted any reference to indemnity for damages, unless the word "restoration," which he uses after "evacuation," means that.

Oh, I can imagine that if these terms had been published before the President's message and had been read from a platform in Mississippi or Kentucky or Kalamazoo by a man who happened to be a Socialist, it would probably have brought him to a lamp-post, with the encouragement of a part of our press.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. To what does the gentleman attribute the fact that the newspapers have almost unanimously suppressed that news?

Mr. LONDON. So far as the newspapers are concerned, I said on a previous occasion, that the man who invented movable type had a just right to consider himself a benefactor of humanity; but the question is, Who does the writing? If we had a press that represented the honest opinion of the men who wrote, whether what they wrote was right or wrong, that would be a contribution to the making of thought; but when you have a newspaper which takes the most brilliant mind and enslaves it and makes a man write things, not that his soul and heart dictate, but the things that he is paid to write, we have the worst form of prostitution, worse than the social evil. [Applause.] The great problem for democracy, using that word in the broadest sense, is how to get an honest press, how to get the people to hear the word of truth or of error honestly, independently, and courageously spoken.

Mr. PLATT. Was not a synopsis of those terms published in a great many newspapers? I am sure I read them, and I do not think I read them in either the World or the Evening Post.

Mr. LONDON. That may be; but the fact is that the men who prepared these demands were being denounced as the most dangerous lunatics that had escaped from an asylum.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman recall the lurid stories of the arrival on the Pacific coast at San Francisco of a vessel supposed to be Russian, the command of which was said to have been taken away from the captain by a committee of three or four, and which was the subject of much investigation for several days?

Mr. LONDON. Oh, the newspaper people will be making up stories if they have not got anything that is really new. A good newspaper man must have some imagination or he would not have the courage to live. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was said of that vessel that it came as a part of the Bolsheviki movement to fraternize with the I. W. W. in the United States, and it was also said, with considerable dramatic effect, that a stack of 150 arms had been found on the vessel by which the I. W. W. was to revolutionize the world.

Mr. LONDON. Yes; and I saw the report of a collection having been taken up at one of these meetings in which they collected $2.11 to revolutionize the world. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And about a week after it appeared somewhere at the bottom of a newspaper column that the vessel had been discharged, the customs officials having declared that there was nothing wrong with the cargo or crew.

Mr. LONDON. If that was the worst thing about the press it would not be as black as it is.

Half of the time we can not find out what is going on. It is unfortunate that we do not get German newspapers and publications in the United States; it has been impossible to obtain in the Congressional Library contemporary German publications since March, 1916. I think I am correct in that statement. We do not know what is going on there. To us it is just as important to know the morale of the German people, to know what their opinions are, what they say, and what they are being permitted or prohibited to say, as it is to know the number of their regiments. This war will be won or lost by the morale of the peoples. It is a world war; it is not a war of armies. It is a war of the people, and we are entitled to know what the German people are saying, what they think they are fighting for.

As a matter of fact, German efficiency is largely a bugaboo. Once in a while we get, in a social democratic paper published in the German language in New York City, extracts of articles from Swiss or Norwegian papers; once in a while an extract of a speech delivered in the Reichstag. Less than four weeks ago we read that the German Socialist paper—the Vorwaerts—reported that 40,000,000 people were starving in Germany. The report of the various committees who investigated the conditions of the occupied Polish Provinces now in possession of Germany disclose a state of affairs which is almost unbelieveable—that infants under the age of 5 have almost disappeared; that children are being brought with swollen stomachs into the hospitals, swollen because of hunger; and that tuberculosis is increasing because of starvation. Evidently the so-called efficiency means taking away everything from the civil population and giving it to the army. The incessant babbling about German efficiency is calculated to arouse the spirit of the savage and of the pugilist, a spirit which is aroused when you are told that the other fellow is getting the better of you.

If we but knew how much they suffer, if we but knew that the Imperial Government has been compelled to change chancellor after chancellor at the demand of the social democrats; if we knew that it was compelled to permit peace meetings; if we knew that all over the cities of Germany they have peace demonstrations, we would know that the enemy has reached the limit of his power and is about to yield and will be compelled to yield. [Applause.] British labor has been speaking boldly and openly. I have before me the report of a speech made in London in December, 1917, by J. H. Thomas, member of Parliament, as copied for me from the Daily Post, of London, England.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOON). The gentleman has 11 minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed until he concludes his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed until he concludes his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Now, here is what this British member of parliament says. After reciting that the country was near an industrial revolution in 1914, after speaking of the patriotic response made by British labor to the appeal of the Government, the paper reports him as saying:

> He was sorry to think how much better it would be for us to-day if we were satisfied in our minds that the same principle, the same feelings, and the same enthusiasm that carried us through the critical months of 1914 was the spirit that is assisting us now. It was not; and no good purpose was to be served by blinding ourselves to that fact.
> What was the cause of what he would call this loss of morale? In the first place, he believed that all the governments since the war began had failed to take the public sufficiently into their confidence.
> During all these years we had never been told the truth, the real truth, of the situation and now we had reached the stage when, unfortunately, they did not believe the word of their statesmen.

People have begun to speak boldly everywhere. I suppose these are some of the voices to which the President referred in his last message and in his message before the last. Somebody somewhere ought to have the courage to raise his voice without being accused of disloyalty, without his devotion to the country being questioned. How can there be any American who will be disloyal to America? How can there be any citizen of the United States who will not wish good to this land? Why should a man be silenced because he has an opinion to express, a story to tell, a message to deliver, a thought to suggest? [Applause.] I am a Socialist. I have been treated fairly by you; I have no complaint to make; but once in a while I do feel like throwing something at the demagogue who dares impeach the loyalty of the Socialists of the United States.

The speaker, continuing, says:

> There have been too many ambiguous phrases as to what we are fighting for. The people would be ready for any sacrifice in order to crush the spirit of militarism; but if we are to remain a people united against the dangers that confront us we must be told in clear and simple terms what are our aims.

When the President came in to deliver his last message I instinctively applauded him. As a rule I do not do that, but, somehow or other, I felt that an advance was about to be made, that a step forward was about to be taken. A clear statement of the objects of the war, even if that statement should contain things which appear to be irreconciliable, is of incalculable benefit to the human race. [Applause.] Let the central powers and the democratic elements throughout the world say, "What is there in that statement of demands, what are the things that we are going to continue to fight for?"

Is there any man in the world who wants to question the right of Belgium to be restored to herself? Is there any man in the world who wants to dispute the right of the smaller nations like Serbia and Montenegro to belong to themselves? If the central powers have the courage to dispute it, let them do so, and they will have the whole world fighting until the Government of Germany is destroyed. No declaration can be taken as the final word. But an unequivocal statement of objects brings things to an issue. The world is then called upon to approve or disapprove, to accept or reject a clearly stated proposition. One thing is quite certain, and that is that the masses are beginning to be heard from. They are taking courage to say what is in their minds and in their hearts. They do not take anything for granted, they are analyzing and studying.

And if they go back to the beginning of this great world contest, here and there a number of men will be found who will discover that the guilt was not all on one side. One of the things that makes me sick at heart is the constant use of the word "Hun." The sinking of the Lusitania was an act of barbarism that will never be forgiven as long as mankind exists. [Applause.] The sinking by torpedoes of commercial and hospital ships is barbarous, and is a reversion to the stage of savagery; but when you speak of an entire people as a Hun people, you do injustice to yourself and to your sense of intelligence.

What was the situation? Here we had a people reaching unity in 1871, building an empire, out of a number of small principalities. Can we ask that they shall break up again into principalities, that they should cease to be one? No. They had a large army, an efficient army. So did their immediate neighbors. Here you have a people 70,000,000 strong, just realizing the value of being a united people. In the Provinces they have a feudal system of government, and are not democratic. As an American professor described the German Government, it is not a government of the people, it is not a government by the people, but it is an attempt to be a government for the people. Every nation has its own psychology, its own institutions.

The Germans are competing with the rest of the world in commerce, in industry, and in science. They are not by any means the greatest people upon earth, but they are a great people. What are the colonies of Germany?

The colonies of Germany contain a population of 12,000,000 souls. What are the colonies of the other countries? France, with a population of thirty-eight or forty million souls, has colonies with 44,000,000 population. Great Britain, with a population of 45,000,000, has colonies with a population of 376,000,000 souls. Of these 376,000,000 souls there are only 18,000,000 who occupy colonies with democratic institutions—in reality, republics, like the Dominion of Canada, Australia, Labrador, South Africa. The claim can not honestly be made that any one of these countries has been in the recent past less imperialistic than the other.

All of them have maintained armies and navies. It is true that naval power is not half as dangerous as military power, as a continental army. Let us assume that the British naval power has been used and will be used in the future solely for defensive purposes, as fleets are not effective for aggression, while a continental army is a serious danger to every neighbor. The presence of a large army in Germany compelled the maintenance of a large army in France, forcing France into the embrace of Russia. This war has been the nightmare of France since 1871.

One can not indict history. No man is all he wants to be. No nation can be all it would like to be. It is the Socialist theory that the principal cause of modern wars has been economic rivalry. I shall quote to you a conservative authority in support of that theory.

The Encyclopædia Britannica in its article on Europe reveals with scientific precision the clash of colonial ambitions of the European powers. It says:

> The conflicting desires of several of the powers to obtain colonial possessions in various parts of the world and to forestall their competitors in the act of taking possession were bound to introduce complications in which England, as the greatest of colonial powers, would generally be involved; and as the unappropriated portions of the earth's surface at the beginning of the period under discussion were to be found chiefly in Africa, it was in the Dark Continent that the conflicts of interests mostly took place. England's chief competitors were France and Germany. Her traditional policy, except in the south of the continent, where the conditions of soil and climate were favorable to European colonists, had been purely commercial. She had refrained from annexation of territory as involving too much expenditure and responsibility, and confined her protection to the trading stations on the coast. When France came into the field this policy had to be abandoned. The policy of France was also commercial in a certain sense, but the methods she adopted were very different. She endeavored to bring under her authority, by annexation or the establishment of protectorates, the largest possible extent of territory, in order to increase her trade by a system of differential tariffs; she encroached on the hinterland of British settlements, and endeavored to direct artificially the native inland trade toward her own ports. A glance at the map of the African west coast will suffice to show the success with which this policy was carried out. When the British Government awoke to the danger, all that could be done was to prevent further encroachments by likewise annexing territory.

So that annexation and desire for annexation was not the vice of any particular nation.

To say that none of these nations had been preparing for this contest would also be a historical falsehood, but I am not going to take advantage of the kindness of the House to go into that. You can all more or less readily ascertain the facts. Bernhardi pointed out in his book, published in 1911, Germany and the Next War, that the strategic Russian roads would be completed in 1915. He predicted that it would be impossible to rely upon Italy because Italian national ambitions conflicted with her being loyal to the central powers. Incidentally, it was he who predicted the value of the submarine as a fighting machine. On the other hand, it appears from an official report, laid before the House of Commons on July 22, 1912, by the First Lord of the Admiralty—you will find it in the Britannica Yearbook of 1913—that Great Britain was officially warned of the menacing growth of the German fleet. In short, this war was not an accident. The selfish and the unselfish, the noble and the ignoble, the highest in men and the meanest combine in war. That is applicable as to individuals as well as to nations. The appeal of Belgium is an appeal to the whole world. The protest against its invasion was a protest to the conscience of the whole world. The protest against the attack upon Serbia is a protest to the world.

When Serbia was attacked by Austria, who moved against Austria? England? No; Russia. Why Russia and not England? Because Constantinople was involved. Belgium was attacked. Who took up the cause? England. Why England? Because English interests—I am not speaking in reproach but as a student of history—English vital interests were in danger. England allowed July to pass, part of August to pass, before it declared war against Austria. The crime against Serbia was surely not less infamous than that against Belgium. Each of them was entitled to the protection of the world.

It is the misunderstanding of the causes of the war and of its aims and objects that has led to the present state of distress in Russia, the land of martyrdom. Kerensky had on six or seven different occasions promised that he would obtain a clear and definite statement of the objects of the war so that the Russian people would not be asked to shed their blood in vain. That statement was not forthcoming. They all loved him, they respected him. He represented no faction, no narrow group, but on six or seven occasions he deceived the people by promising them a clear statement of the objects of the war, and instead of a clear statement there was an outpouring of polysyllables from the inexhaustible English vocabulary. You can not feed people with words all the time. Here is what the President said in December——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Before the gentleman takes up that subject. Who does the gentleman mean by the term "people of Russia"? Who was it Kerensky deceived?

Mr. LONDON. I do not say he deceived them, he certainly did not deceive them intentionally. I should have used the word "disappointed." I mean by the people of Russia the man who tills the soil; the man who walks behind the plow; the man who is called upon to sacrifice his life by fighting; I mean by the people of Russia the illiterate, the poor, and the ignorant as well as the intellectual, the peasants as well as the big landowners who speak a little French and are cultured. I mean by the people of Russia those who have lived there and have been suffering there all their lives. It is the people of Russia in whose behalf the President of the United States has made a warm and noble appeal in his last message delivered to the American Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman will yield for another inquiry. Does the gentleman mean the people of Russia are those who are now working for Germany and the Kaiser?

Mr. LONDON. Oh, but the President has disposed of that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Who has?

Mr. LONDON. The President of the United States has disposed of that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He may have for the gentleman from New York but not for anybody else of whom I know.

Mr. LONDON. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota does not assume to speak for the entire American people? [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is quite certain I voice the sentiment of the American people a heap sight better than the gentleman from New York who is now on his feet and addressing the House.

Mr. LONDON. I guess I better disregard the gentleman from Minnesota. I am dealing with big things.

How many years did it take the United States, the little Republic of 3,000,000 souls, to establish a stable form of government? You had the Whiskey Rebellion. You had the confederation struggling for years to establish a government. You had constitutional conventions composed of the best minds of America, who many times gave up the hope of framing a constitution. And after all, the builders of the Constitution had to compromise with slavery, knowing well that some day it would lead to civil war. You can not take 180,000,000 people and organize them in a day. It is only the selfish and the unthinking who would condemn 180,000,000 people who have struggled for centuries and have finally overthrown an autocratic form of government. The rest of the world sympathizes with that long-suffering people. [Applause.]

Had the allies made a definite declaration five or six months ago Russia would have been saved to them to-day. And even to-day Russia exhausted, bleeding at every pore, starving Russia, repudiates a selfish peace and pleads for the peace of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. No; I do not like the tone of the gentleman, who attempts to speak as the father confessor for the American people.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. How much time has the gentleman received in the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has spoken one hour exactly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How much more time has the gentleman?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As much as he needs.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman was extended the privilege——

Mr. LONDON. I did not want to be offensive. If I was, I am sorry.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman from New York was never sorry for anything in his life.

Mr. LONDON. I am always sorry if I happen to do a wrong, and I am always man enough to attempt to correct it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman now yield for an inquiry?

Mr. LONDON. A relevant inquiry.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman approve of the efforts on the part of the present Russian Government to make a separate peace with Germany?

Mr. LONDON. What nonsense. Why should the gentleman ask that question when he knows that I sent a cablegram to the president of the Soldiers and Workmen's Council in April of last year suggesting that a separate peace was a danger to Russia and a danger to the world? I sent that message, getting myself into trouble with the pacifists, who instead of possessing the idea of peace is possessed by that idea. Why should the gentleman ask me that question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I repeat it.

Mr. LONDON. I have just praised Russia's effort to bring about universal peace. Is it not a condemnation of the theory of a separate peace?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is opposed to the present movement?

Mr. LONDON. I deny there is a present movement for a separate peace. On the contrary, these men are to-day speaking for universal peace. But one should have patience with a people who are in the agony of a revolution and of war. Men are abnormal in time of war. How much more difficult is it to be normal when war is added to revolution.

Mr. PLATT. May I suggest that anybody who reads John Fiske's Critical Period of American History will find that we were in very much the same state, not in all respects, of course, but almost as hopeless, in founding a stable government.

Mr. LONDON. I have read a number of works on that period of American history. I have in my bedroom a volume on the French Revolution, and when things look very dark in Russia I take up one of those volumes and find how much better things are in Russia. For one thing, the guillotine is not busy.

All I want is to urge the necessity of taking up for discussion the basic principles upon which a permanent peace can be established for the world and by the world. I am an opponent of anarchy. I hate disorder. I detest with every fiber of my being the abuse of physical force and the taking advantage of the weak by the strong. I detest it in industry when it takes little children and exploits their helplessness for profit. I detest oppression. I am for order. I stand for order and for peaceful methods. I love America not because it is the best that can be given to mankind, but because of the opportunity it affords to fight for better things, and so long as that opportunity exists we will have better things.

Democracy does not guarantee to be wise; democracy does not guarantee to be always just; but it is always wiser and always more just than the little groups who speak in the name of the peoples. I stand for order in the relation of each man to his nation and of each citizen to the government to which he owes loyalty and of each nation to the rest of the world. That is why I advocate the necessity of international order instead of international chaos, international destruction, and international anarchy. I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to proceed for 30 minutes, to reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOON). The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] a question in the utmost good faith. It will take only a moment if the gentleman from Illinois will kindly withhold.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] will give me his attention, I would like to ask him a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the gentleman has yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point is well taken.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me for one minute in which to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks leave to proceed for one minute. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; pending my request for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. My question is this: Which nation mobilized her troops first and started this war?

Mr. LONDON. The cause of this war, if the gentleman please, was the attack by Austria-Hungary upon Serbia.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I confess that. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. LONDON. And there is no doubt but that Austria-Hungary would not have taken that step unless it had been supported by the Kaiser and his crowd.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I agree with that. Who mobilized his troops first?

Mr. LONDON. It is not a question of who mobilized first, but who was responsible for the mobilization.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I wish the gentleman would answer that question.

Mr. LONDON. I take it for granted that the first to mobilize was Austria-Hungary.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; Russia.

Mr. LONDON. I mean against Serbia.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; of course.

Mr. LONDON. The spark that started the conflagration came from Austria-Hungary.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman think that the quickest and only way to get a peace for democracy is to——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is recognized.

PROMOTION OF EXPORT TRADE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 2316, known as the export bill, with Senate amendments thereto, be taken from the Speaker's table, that the Senate amendments be disagreed to and the conference agreed to, as asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House bill 2316, to promote export trade, and for other purposes, be taken from the Speaker's table, the Senate amendments disagreed to, and the conference asked by the Senate agreed to. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2316) to promote export trade, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill be taken from the Speaker's table and the conference agreed to, as asked for by the Senate.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I ask that the bill be taken from the Speaker's table and a conference agreed to, as asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WEBB, Mr. CARLIN, and Mr. VOLSTEAD.

DECLINING AMERICAN BIRTH RATE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an address by Louis I. Dublin, statistician of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., delivered before the American Association for the Advancement of Science on December 29, 1917, concerning the decline of the American birth rate. It is an interesting document which should not be allowed to die.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the adress referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the address referred to:

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE DECLINING BIRTH RATE.

[Address of retiring vice president, Section I, Social and Economic Science, American Association for Advancement of Science, Pittsburgh, Dec. 29, 1917, by Louis I. Dublin, statistician, Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.]

It is a custom of this section, I believe, for the retiring vice president to select for his address a subject of national interest in the field of social economy. He is expected to avoid narrow and technical discussion of specialties, but he may properly summarize the important works of other investigators in specialized fields to show their trend and bearing, and he may also point out the direction which further research should take. These requirements of the occasion are all the more necessary now, in view of the circumstances under which we are living. We are going through a period of serious conflict. Our Nation is at present engaged in concentrating its resources of men, of materials, and, above all, of thought to make itself felt in the world struggle for preserving civilization. This is no time for trivialities or for small detail. Under these conditions the Section on Social and Economic Science of the American Association may be expected to have a message of national import. It would be almost common to take your time and attention for anythiug but a topic of the widest practical significance in the present national emergency.

With these considerations in mind, I have chosen as the subject of this address the significance of our declining birth rate. I have done so with considerable hesitancy, because of the difficulty of the subject and the importance of its present lesson. I shall count also on your forbearance, hoping that you will forgive the incompleteness and sketchy character of my argument. The study of American demography has convinced me that we are concerned with a problem of the greatest possible moment. Changes have been progressing in the internal structure of our population which have, for the most part, escaped attention and which, if allowed to continue, will result in very serious national embarrassment. Conditions of war bring into relief the necessity for a vigorous and efficient population. It is not too much to say that the present tendencies in our national and family life are such as seriously threaten the development of those groups in the population on which we must rely for vigor and efficiency in thought and action.

The declining birth rate has received but little scientific attention in the United States. It has been, however, the subject of very careful investigation in Europe. During the last 50 years the birth rate has declined in virtually every country of the civilized world. Some countries have been affected more than others, but the phenomenon has been observed in extreme form in one country, namely, France. France has made an experiment in birth control on a national scale. All the parts of that experiment, including the end result, are now on view and available for scientific observation and comment. Before the present war France had already reached a point where her birth rate had decreased to a point below her death rate; her population was actually decreasing. But for 10 years before that time the approaching crisis had called for the careful attention of her best minds.

A commission on depopulation, composed of statesmen and sociologists, was appointed to study the problem, and a comprehensive report on the sources of depopulation was prepared. This report is too elaborate for detailed description here. I shall rather present the situation for France, as I understand it, in broad outline, bringing into relief only the main findings of the commission.

Let us consider the growth of population during the last century in the three leading countries of western Europe, namely, France, the United Kingdom, and the States composing the German Empire. At the beginning of the nineteenth century France was the leader of the three countries, with a population of about 29,000,000. The States which now compose the German Empire were second, with a population of about 23,000,000, and the United Kingdom stood third, with a population of about 18,000,000. A century later we find the situation totally changed. The German Empire headed the list with a population of nearly 65,000,000; the United Kingdom was second, with a population of 45,000,000; and France was third, with a population of only 39,000,000. In other words, while the population of the German Empire had nearly trebled and the United Kingdom had increased to two and one-half times its earlier numbers, the population of France had increased less than one-half. Further inspection of the figures show that a marked change in the rate of increase of the population of France occurred about the year 1860. At that time France was still in the lead and had already reached a population of 37,000,000. After that date it increased only 2,000,000, while Germany in the same period almost doubled in population. In 1811 the population of France constituted 16 per cent of all Europe. One hundred years later the French population constituted only 9 per cent of the total.

This situation for France may be accounted for principally in terms of its declining birth rate. Such figures as I have for France show that at about 1830 the rate was 30 births per 1,000 of population. The last available figure for 1914 was 18 per 1,000; the death rate was 19.6 per 1,000. This was the first war year, but already in 1911 the death rate, 19.6, exceeded the birth rate, 18.7. The reduction of more than one-third in the birth rate during the 80 years was both gradual and continuous. On the other hand, the birth rates in the German Empire and in the United Kingdom continued high, over 30 per 1,000 up to 1895 in the latter and up to 1909 in the former. Since then the birth rates have declined rapidly in both countries, but the enormous increase in population for both Germany and the United Kingdom were achieved before the changes in the birth rate began to make themselves seriously felt.

We are not concerned entirely with gross totals of population. Equally significant is the internal structure of population. As we shall see later, changes in the constitution of a population almost invariably appear with changes in the birth rate. This will become clearer by comparing the ages below which one-quarter, one-half, and three-quarters of the total populations of Germany, of England and Wales, and of France, respectively, are found. Thus, one-quarter of the population of Germany is under age 11, one-quarter of the population of England and Wales is under 12 years of age, whereas one-quarter of the French population is under age 14 years. Again, one-half of the population of Germany is found under 23.5 years, one-half of the population of England and Wales is below 26 years, while one-half of the French population is below age 30. We find, finally, that three-quarters of the population of Germany is below age 41 years, of England and Wales is below 42 years, and of France is below 49 years. These figures show clearly that the average age of the French population is considerably higher than that of the other two countries. Its youth and its strength form a smaller part of its total population, while its old aud its dependents form a much larger part. This, we shall find, is an invariable consequence of a decreasing birth rate, which reduces the proportion of the young and thus brings into relief an undue proportion of the aged.

The declining national birth rate of France is also severely selective in character. The reduction of the birth rate has affected mostly those who are both economically and socially best fitted to bear and to raise a family to maturity. A careful classification by Bertillon of the number of children per 100 families in Paris shows that the very poor have the largest number and the very rich the smallest number of children. The order of size of the family is invariably the reverse of the order of economic condition. Since economic status is highly associated with efficiency and social worth, low birth rates in the best equipped groups of the population can have but one effect on the vital constitution of the next generation, namely, a decline in constructive effort for national development.

Evidence suggestive of such decline in national development is afforded by the fact that coincident with a rapidly declining birth rate France has had a high and rather stationary death rate during the last quarter of a century. England, through the development of its public-health service, reduced its death rate to under 14 per 1,000 in the year before the war (1913), when France had a death rate of 4 per 1,000 higher. In spite of the low French birth rate, the infant mortality rate has not been low and has been coupled with a high still-birth rate. The death rate from tuberculosis in France has recently come into public notice here because of war conditions, but it was high before the war. The acute infectious diseases, including typhoid fever, which have so readily lent themselves to control in other European countries and in the United States, show unsatisfactory death rates for France. In fact, we find in this country, side by side with a low rate of reproduction, evidence of indifference to the conservation of the valuable lives that are born. A disturbing element in the French situation to-day is the lack of a national public-health program. Is it not possible that such conditions follow directly from the absence in the community of those earnest and able men who everywhere further progress along social and economical lines? These leaders of the nation are absent because they were not born. It would seem from the facts that where the psychology of a people permits depopulation to go on for a long period unchecked other evil tendencies of national life appear, such as indifference to the obligation of maintaining high standards of public health.

It is painful to say these things at this time, and I should refrain from referring to them were it not for the necessity of emphasizing the facts which so directly affect our own American population problems.

The experience of England has been much less acute, although the tendency of the most recent years has been fully as disturbing as that in France during the previous decade. In the 5-year period between 1871 and 1875 the birth rate was 35.5 per 1,000 of population. In the period 1911 to 1914, inclusive, the birth rate was only 24 per 1,000. The reduction in the birth rate in England has been accompanied, to be sure, with a very healthy decline in the death rate. In the forty-odd years since 1871 this has decreased from 22 to less than 14 per 1,000; whereas the decreasing birth rate in France did not accompany any appreciable reduction in the death rate. The rate of natural increase has, however, declined in England from 13.5 in the period 1871 to 1875 to 10.1 per 1,000 in the period 1911 to 1914. England was still increasing in population at the rate of 1 per cent annually before the war. The reduction in the rate of natural increase and certain internal changes in structure of population had, however, become a source of apprehension to English statesmen, and a commission of qualified experts was appointed to study and report on the problem. Their findings have been available for some time and may be summarized as follows:

The birth rate has declined to the extent of approximately one-third during the last 35 years.

This decline has not been due to any large extent to a decline in the marriage rate or to a rise in the mean age at marriage or to other causes diminishing the proportion of married women of fertile age in the population. The decline has been due rather to a conscious limitation of fertility in the large mass of the population.

The decline in the birth rate, although general, has not been uniformly distributed over all sections of the community. It has affected primarily those economic and social groups which, as we have shown for France, are best able to bear and maintain a good-sized family. Thus we find that the number of legitimate births per 1,000 married males under 55 years in England and Wales was 119 for the upper and middle classes and 213 for the unskilled workmen, with a maximum of 230 among the miners. The birth rate is greater as the economic and social status is lower.

Internal changes of population are taking place in England very similar to those observed in France. Under the influence of the decreasing birth rate the average age of the population of England and Wales is rising and the proportion of old persons is, of course, correspondingly increasing. If we keep in mind also that the mortality rates of females at the adult ages are progressively lower than those for males we are not surprised to find that the increasing proportion of old people is greater among females than among males. While there were, for example, 119 females per 100 males in 1871 at the ages 65 and over, the number in 1911 had become 132. The disturbing element in this picture is that the population is growing older not only through the increased longevity of its constituents but more especially through the decreasing reenforcement from its youth, and, due to the operation of mortality, that there is a progressive excess of females over males at the older ages. The situation in England may be summed up in the words of her leading demographer, Sir J. Athelstane Baines, as follows: "In the last 40 years the proportion of people of an age to marry has materially increased, but they marry less and later in life, and thus, to some extent, cause a reduction in the number of births. The main cause of the falling birth rate, however, is the decline in the fertility of the married due to the voluntary restriction of childbearing, a decline which has been especially rapid since the bebinning of the century. The effects of the fall in the birth rate have been neutralized, until within the last few years, by a still greater fall in the death rate. The improvement has not been so marked amongst the very young and the old as at adolescence and in the prime of life. While, therefore, the rate of natural increase has diminished less than the fall in the birth rate would indicate, it has been maintained at the expense of the young."

"As the proportion of infants with a high mortality decreased, that of the ages of low mortality increased. The death rate went down, and the balance of population became economically favorable. But as the supply of infants diminishes relatively to the rest of the community, and their elders pass from their prime into the time of life when mortality is heavy, the proportionate supply of potential parents of the most prolific ages tends to decrease, the birth rate falls more rapidly, and the death rate begins to rise, leaving the margin of natural increase alarmingly narrow. The result is an older and less vigorous people, and, as the vitality of women is greater than that of men, more of the former sex reach maturity, and they last longer, so that a relatively small and probably wholesome numerical superiority at the working ages is converted into a growing preponderance of old women in the vale of life."

I shall now present the situation for the United States. Superficially the facts of American population growth present a very favorable picture. Each successive census has shown a marked increase in our total population over the preceding one; that for 1910 showed an increase of nearly 16,000,000 lives over 1900, or 21 per cent. Such data as we have for births and deaths indicate a similar situation. Our birth rate is probably about 25 per 1,000, and the death rate for the entire country not far from 15 per 1,000. The difference between the birth rate and the death rate, the rate of natural increase, is about 10 per 1,000, or 1 per cent annually. The rate is much the same as we found for England and Wales in the year before the war. No one should find fault with a rate of natural increase of 1 per cent per year. The population problem of France would be considered on a fair way to solution if that country could maintain for a period of years a rate corresponding to even one-half of that which we now enjoy in the United States.

The difficulty with our American situation is that we have been satisfied with a gross showing. We have not looked underneath the surface to observe the varying tendency in the several groups of the population and in the several sections of the country. The marked increase in our total population is in large measure the result of two factors, (1) immigration and (2) a high rate of increase in the foreign born rather than in our native stock. This is shown by the constantly decreasing proportion which the native whites of native parentage form of the total white population. In 1870, for example, this group formed 67.8 per cent of the total white population in the United States, while in 1910 it had decreased to 60.5 per cent. The proportion of the foreign stock correspondingly increased during these 40 years. These figures are accentuated if we turn to certain areas of the country. Thus, in the New England States the proportion of the native white stock decreased from 52.3 per cent of the total white population in 1890 to 40.3 per cent in 1910. In the Middle Atlantic States the native white stock decreased from 51.8 in 1890 to 44.8 in 1910. In these important areas the native stock is playing an ever smaller part in the composition of the total population. In fact, a very definite tendency toward depopulation has already fastened itself upon a large part of the native stock of the country.

There has been a marked and continuous reduction in the birth rate in the United States for a period of years. In the absence of comprehensive birth statistics, such as are available for European countries, we must turn to other sources which are clearly indicative of the changes which have occurred in the birth rate. We may use, for example, the number of children under 5 per thousand women in the child-bearing ages, namely, 15 to 44 years, inclusive.

Prof. Willcox in a recent paper has shown that this proportion has decreased about 50 per cent in the course of the last hundred years. At the beginning of the century there were 976 children under 5 for every 1,000 women between the ages of 15 to 44 years, whereas in 1910 the number was only 508 per thousand women at these ages. During the 60 years between 1850 and 1910 the number of children under 5 per thousand women at the childbearing ages decreased in the United States by 191, or at an average of 32 in each decade. The rate of decline in the recent decades has been so rapid that Prof. Willcox suggests amusedly that if it were continued over a period of a century and a half, which is a comparatively short time in the life of a nation, there would be no children at all at the end of that time.

The decline in the birth rate in the United States has been, as elsewhere, selective in character. In Massachusetts, for example, where the best American data on birth rates are available, we find first, that there has been a continuous decrease in the birth rate during the last 40 years, and, second, that this decrease has been most marked in the native stock. In 1910 the native stock had a birth rate of 14.9 per thousand; the foreign-born birth rate was 49.1 per thousand. In the same year the native death rate was 16.3 per thousand, while the foreign death rate was only 15.4. There was thus an excess of deaths over births corresponding to a net annual loss of a little more than one-tenth of 1 per cent in the native stock, while there was an annual increase of 3.4 per cent among the foreign-born population.

A tabulation of a significant sample of the population returns for the 1910 census shows similar differences in the fecundity of women of native and foreign parentage. In a group of women under 45 years of age, who were married for a period of from 10 to 20 years, the average number of children was found to be 4.1 per married woman. The women of native parentage, however, showed an average of only 2.7 children, whereas the women of foreign parentage showed an average of 4.4 per married woman. In like manner it was found that 7.4 per cent of the women under 45 years, who had been married 10 to 20 years, had borne no children. The women of native parentage had borne no children in 13 per cent of the cases, whereas the women of foreign parentage had borne no children in only 5.7 per cent of the cases. In view of the fact that very few children are born to women who have been unproductive for a period of at least 10 years, we may consider these figures as fairly reliable indices of sterility in the two groups. We find that close to 40 per cent of the married women of native parentage had borne only one or two children, whereas the women of foreign parentage showed only 19 per cent of their number in this group. Finally, only about 10 per cent of the women of native parentage had 5 children or more, whereas 33 per cent of the women of foreign parentage belong in this group.

I hope I am not assuming too much when I infer that these figures show selection in the decline of the birth rate. The race stock which laid the foundations of our institutions during the critical period of our national existence is, in large areas of the country, no longer maintaining itself and its place is being taken gradually but surely by foreign races, which, as we have seen, are reproducing very rapidly.

Additional evidence of the selective character of the declining birth rate is presented in special studies on the size of families of college graduates and of men of science. Thus Phillips, in his work on the birth rate among graduates of Harvard and Yale Universities, shows that the number of children born per married graduate has fallen from about 3.25, in the decade 1850 to 1860, to a little over 2, in the decade 1881 and 1890. Similar facts are observed in the statistics for other college graduates, but none are so low as those for the graduates of colleges for women. Thus we find that the number of children per married woman graduate of Smith College was only 1.3, of Vassar 1.6, of Bryn Mawr 1.7, and of Holyoke 1.8. Even more significant is the ratio of children per graduate, which for all of these colleges is less than one, due to the fact that less than 50 per cent of the graduates of women's colleges marry. Prof. Cattell further shows in his study of 643 American men of science that the families from which the scientific men had come had an average of 4.7 children, while these scientific men who were married and whose families were complete had an average of only 2.3 children, these figures including all the children born. We shall later see how far from adequate such an average number of children is for maintaining the status quo in the respective groups.

In the preceding discussion I have referred frequently to the number of children per family in groups of our population, and have intimated that some families were small, that others were fairly normal, and that others were large. You may now properly ask me what the average number of children per family should be. The answer to the question depends upon the point of view, namely, upon the amount of natural increase one would wish to see in a generation. As there is likely to be a difference of opinion on this point, I shall attempt to show only what the number of children in a family must be, under present conditions, in order that the population may remain stationary; anything above this figure will mean natural increase, anything below will mean a decrease in population.

It is obvious that the basis of every family is two individuals. The question then resolves itself as follows: How many children must be born to every family in order that two individuals may be raised to maturity? The number of children born must be more than two for a number of reasons. The first is the fact of mortality. The death rate is exceptionally high in the period of childhood, amounting in the first year of life to about 10 per cent of the babies born. If we begin with 100,000 at birth and trace them through from year to year, we find that about 75,000 are alive at the average age at marriage. This is according to the mortality rate that prevails over a large portion of the United States. The rest have died. This fact alone would make it necessary that every marriage result in an average of two and one-half children in order that two persons may attain the average age of marriage and replace their parents in the population. But this assumes, first, that all persons marry, and, second, that every marriage is productive. As a matter of fact, all persons do not marry. In our own country from 12 to 15 per cent do not marry until after the reproductive period, if at all. A considerable proportion of marriages, over 7 per cent, are sterile. When we make the necessary corrections in our figures, the average number of children per family which must be born is increased to close to four in order that the stock may maintain itself without increase or decrease.

I say without hesitation that a large part of the native stock of this country is in this sense not maintaining itself. It is not producing the four children that are necessary to perpetuate the stock. This fact is true primarily for those families in the population which, by economic and social standards, are best able to bear and rear families. On the other hand, those groups in our population which are economically and socially less able to raise families are still producing on the average in excess of the minimum necessary to maintain the status quo. As a result, the balance of population is in favor of the less economically efficient. The best blood of America is being constantly thinned out by the exercise of a conscious limitation of births and is being replaced by a stock of a different order. Our national standards are being leveled to meet more and more the lower quality of our population.

If I have succeeded in making a plausible diagnosis of one of our national ills, will you permit me also to suggest a remedy for the condition? I should say, at the outset, that since many causes have been at work to produce the end result which I have described, it will require many lines of action to improve the situation. I shall, however, suggest some thoughts which seem to me to reach the heart of the problem more nearly than any others.

The State is largely responsible for the present condition. The system of education which it has provided for the youth of the country has failed for the most part to inculcate national ideals. Our young people have grown up without a broad outlook on life. They have been taught to think in terms of personal convenience and advancement, and not in terms of the common good. Democratic education is a failure if it neglects to make provision for the character of its future citizenship. Our young men and women must be taught to realize early that we do not live for ourselves; that our intellectual, economic, and social advancement must be carried forward not only as tradition but more especially in terms of new, vigorous, and worthy personalities. Our educational system must make our various racial groups conscious of their best traditions and instill desires to see their better strains strengthened and increased as a foundation of the greater democracy of the future.

The education of our women is especially faulty in this regard. Our schools and colleges, with few exceptions, direct the thoughts and energies of our girls away from ideals of normal home life and center them upon personal refinement or upon personal ambition. It is no uncommon thing to find that girls have gone through their entire college course without a single occasion when the subject of their place in society as mothers and wives was given serious consideration. No wonder that our educated women think mainly of "careers" or of pleasures offered by society as the aim of existence. These are all false gods which smother the natural and wholesome instincts which every species possess to insure its maintenance. The old virtues of womanhood need restatement to-day. Whatever else women learn in the schools they must be educated for their place as mothers, and democratic education must make efficient provision for this primary function.

The State is guilty of another sin. It has made no provision to reward, either substantially or with esteem, the women who, realizing their obligation to the State, are willing to bring up families of normal size. The bearing and rearing of children is costly, both in energy and in funds, and must act as a check on personal ambition and on the enjoyment of the freedom and pleasures of social life. A family of four children requires all the attention of the thoughtful and capable woman. Her success as a mother will be at the expense, in the majority of cases, of her achievement in other fields. It is not asking too much that such a woman should be favored with the admiration of the community in which she lives and not, as at present, with its commiseration and pity. The State may find it expedient, likewise, to encourage parenthood by considering the size of the family as a factor, among others, in fixing exemptions from taxes.

Individual selfishness is at bottom the source of the evil I have described. An increasing number of men and women do not assume the marital state or, when married, do not raise a family of children because they prefer to live better than their forebears and to spend more on themselves than would be possible if they had children to raise and educate. Under present conditions children are not an economic asset. Restrictive compulsory education and child-labor laws make children an expensive luxury which only the poor can afford. In fact, there is no very good reason, on the score of personal comfort alone, why individuals should assume the obligations and sacrifices which large families entail. Such, indeed, is the logical conclusion of our growing materialism.

Yet the shallowness of this attitude must be obvious. Men and women who to-day are rallying to the defense of the country in war time need not be reminded that we live not for ourselves but rather for the fuller life of the community. If only the same spirit would animate us in times of peace, more would then meet their obligation to the State through parenthood. A new citizenship would then arise which would be worthy to receive the noble traditions from our past and to carry our civilization forward into the future. Our appeal must be made to the religious impulse in our individual lives. It will require all the religious power latent in our people to set us right. I do not mean the mandate of any particular religious sect but rather the ethical force which arises within us when we realize clearly our relation to the community about us and the obligation which this relationship involves. The problem of the size of the family, like a whole host of other important social questions, will be solved only when men realize the holy purpose of life, that we are here to add to the sum total of the common good; in a word, that we must leave the world better than we have found it.

In conclusion, let me emphasize the need for birth release among the healthy and normal people of our country as a primary national duty. Such release must be conscious and deliberate, the act of will of free individuals who thus express a highly moral purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

SOCIALISM IN AMERICA.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with some hesitancy that, without any preparation, or even with most careful preparation, I enter into a discussion of these matters with a man who has on so many occasions in this House demonstrated himself to be a master of debate. [Applause.] I have listened with great interest to the scholarly address of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON]. We have been fortunate in having in this House, whenever we have had representatives of the Socialist Party, scholarly, capable, pleasant gentlemen, and the gentleman from New York is the peer of any of them in those particulars.

The difficulty about socialism is that as it presents many of its propositions you can not disagree with them. With unalarming advance socialism proceeds in this country and the world, holding, always, every position it gains. I am unwilling to agree with the position that the gentleman takes so positively and with so much force, that the principles enunciated in the President's message to this country and to the world, proposing terms of peace, were discovered by the Socialists of Russia, or were discovered by the Socialists of any other country in the world. Prior to the opening of this awful war, before the invasion of Belgium, 600 peace societies were at work in the civilized nations of the world, every one of them proclaiming as fundamental principles those 14 or 15 propositions contained in the President's message. Our own Declaration of Independence proclaims the right of peoples to govern themselves, and that is the principle which underlies the several peace propositions submitted by the President of the United States; first of all, the right of nations, great or small, to govern themselves and to work out their own destinies. And then there follows, as a matter of course, if that principle is to be recognized in the world, the principle that the nations must disarm, in order that none of them may become strong enough to threaten the existence of smaller and weaker nations. The Socialists of Russia, in announcing these propositions, discovered nothing new; and the fact that a few days later, or about the same time, Lloyd-George, speaking for Great Britain, announced substantially the same propositions, and that a few hours later the President of the United States announced, in substance, the same propositions does not prove that any priority of discovery rests with the Socialists of Russia.

I have been interested in his discussion of this subject to-day, because the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], with splendid ability and profound scholarship, goes back to the propositions announced by Carl Marx, the greatest of all socialists, and calls attention to socialism in its international aspect; without an international character socialism can not succeed in this world.

And now I want to call the attention of this House to the remarkable advance of socialism among the nations of the world, and of socialistic theories here in these United States. The differences between the parties as at present organized and as this war proceeds are absolutely academic. There are no tariff differences worth mentioning in view of these great questions which loom upon the horizon of the nations. The world is being made over in the fiery ordeal of war, and after this world war closes you will see in this country, in all probability a realignment of parties, greater and more pronounced than occurred during the period of the Civil War and after the Civil War to meet these new issues. Socialism tenders the greatest of all of them. The time is approaching in this country and in the world for the nations and the statesmen who lead the thought of the nations to determine whether or not socialism is the correct theory upon which nations shall conduct themselves through the centuries to come. Now, let us see how far we have proceeded in this country in the direction of socialism.

The gentleman has discussed Russian socialism in its international aspects. The gentleman is not in harmony with the expressions of his own party in this country or in Germany; and if socialism in this international aspect means what these propositions indicate, the propositions which it is alleged they have submitted to Germany, then there seems to be no apparent present international danger from the spread of socialism. But within the boundaries of Russia as they existed recently socialism is developing and developing with a wonderful rapidity.

We must remember that 80, and perhaps 90, per cent of the people of Russia are illiterate. They are not to blame for that. They are struggling through illiteracy—let us hope the millions there are struggling toward the light. They believe they are. I remember as I stand here some of the facts of Russian history. I remember that during the early centuries of the Christian era the Slavs, protected by the towering heights of the Carpathian Mountains, slowly developed and spread over Russia, without any organization, because they did not need any organization; without any head men, without any chiefs, without any central organization of any kind, because they were in no danger from their neighbors. Rome had extended her boundaries as far in that direction as she cared to extend them, and under these circumstances and without any sort of a government the Slav nations developed until they spread over Russia. Then there came the failure of the Byzantine Empire, and the necessity for protection against their enemies; and the socialistic theories which prevailed then, although they did not call it socialism and had never heard of its principles, of course were unable to protect them against their enemies. They invited the Russ, the Norsemen of the Baltic Sea, great blond warriors, who came down there at their invitation, covered with iron armor, and built castles outside of their villages, and exacted a military tribute. And then, following the advent of the Russ, there came the Tartars, and then the Muscovite kings, and from that developed the Romanoff régime, which lasted until a recent period, and which cemented these vastly different types of people at least into one great nation.

The situation in Russia to-day is this: Ninety per cent of the population, an illiterate population, following a few dreamers, have thrown off the Russ, the Tartar, and the Muscovite king influences, and have harked back to the ninth century, when they had only village organizations, and nothing else.

They will develop in time as other nations have, and if it takes them as long as it has taken other nations to develop from an organization of that kind into the present modern State, it will take 1,000 years. I hope the Russians are proceeding in the proper direction, and that they are working out their proper salvation.

PRINCIPLES UPON WHICH ALL RUSSIAN FACTIONS AGREE.

As I stand here I recall the principles upon which all elements in Russian politics to-day are united, including the Don Cossacks, who are small land owners. They stand united upon these three propositions: First, the giving of the land to the peasants; second, the distribution of the profits of industrials among the workingmen; third, the compelling of the well-to-do to pay all the expenses of the Government. In harmony with the latter proposition, they have confiscated the deposits in the banks of Russia, with the guarantee only that the smaller deposits will be protected for the smaller depositors. And if we are to believe the reports which reach this Capital City, they have confiscated even the deposits in the banks placed there by this Government to maintain in their capital city an embassy representing the greatest Republic in the world. These tendencies are not encouraging.

HOW FAR HAVE WE PROGRESSED IN SOCIALISM?

Now, let us see how far we are proceeding in this country in the direction of socialism. It may be all right in its international aspects according to present international world politics, as explained so ably and so clearly by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON]; but as an interior force within the nations it is obtaining its expression in Russia to-day, and we know what it means. I am not ready to agree to the spread of socialistic theories, so far as I am concerned.

Now, let us see how far we are progressing in that direction. We have taken over the railroads with the approval of all their employees, and with the vociferous and apparently unanimous approval of the owners of the railroads themselves. And the fact that the owners of the railroads approve the taking over of the railroads is evidenced by the fact that they are so anxious to acquire more and more of the stock that the stock is increasing in value almost by leaps and bounds. The employees of the railroads are all for the proposition, because they expect larger compensation for their services. The owners of the railroads are in favor of the proposition because they expect from their investment a larger and a more assured income.

The millionaire owners of railroads, the million or more employees of railroads, are proceeding in the same socialistic direction, demanding more and more compensation, and expecting it now to be guaranteed by the Treasury of the United States or paid out of the Treasury of the United States. We sit here to-day face to face with the proposition that one-fifth—certainly one-sixth—of the adult voting population of the United States are either directly or indirectly on the national pay roll, and that you have here the power to increase or decrease their compensation. I know of no railroad employee, I know of no Government employee, who does not want his compensation increased. They are willing, all of them, that it be done out of the Treasury of the United States, and there is no definite objection or protest against this by any party or any definite section of the population of this country. All of them apparently stand for it, and that is socialism, of course.

We just agreed to a resolution a few minutes ago in this House which means the ultimate ownership and control of the water-power possibilities in this country by the Government itself. In 50 years from now it will mean it, they say, and if Government ownership proceeds to gather momentum with the rapidity that it has in the recent weeks it will not be long until we take them over. We are already controlling the distribution of the coal supply. It is not logical to control the distribution of coal unless you control also the coal mines of the country. The owners of the coal mines will not object, and the millions of employees who work in the mines will not object. If you take over the coal, why not take over the copper mines and the iron mines. The owners of those mines will not object, because it means that under our theory of government we must compensate them. We can not confiscate their property. They are willing to be compensated and to live without effort on their part their lives hereafter, their compensation insured out of the Treasury of the United States.

If you take over all these things, why not take over the instruments for the distribution of intelligence. That is the logical thing—to take over the telegraph and the telephones of the country. It is just as logical to control them as it is to control the Postal Service of the country. You will find that the owners will not object; they will be satisfied, because it means an easy income for them and for their children, paid out of the Treasury of the United States as long as they may live, or an adequate lump-sum compensation for the taking over of their property. And so we plunge along, being irresistibly drawn in this country into the very maelstrom of socialism.

The Government can do any one thing better than any one private individual or any one group of individuals. The Government can control the railroads better than private individuals. The Government can control the telephone and the telegraph better than private individuals. The Government can do any one thing better than any individual or any aggregation of individuals can do it. But when the Government commences to do them all, what sort of a situation are you up against?

HOW SOCIALISM MAY COME.

When the Government commences to control all these things, with the approval of all the employees of these industries, with the approval of all the owners, then that party which favors the perpetuity of Government control and ownership when this war ends—that party which pledges its unequivocal support of these things—will win in the elections, of course. There will be enough voters believing themselves to be compensated out of the Treasury to make it possible for that party to win, and when that party wins under these circumstances socialism has arrived in this Nation. Then there comes these other things to which so large a portion of the people of the United States seem to be chaining themselves without knowing it—a different method of holding land—perhaps it will be a single-tax system or a method of communal ownership. If everybody is compensated by the State, then there must be a confiscation of private property and private incomes. All of the parties in Russia, including the Don Cossacks, have declared against private ownership of any kind of property. The Don Cossacks, in their resolutions a short time ago, as announced in the papers of this country, say that confiscation of land applies only to the large estates, that estates as large as they own will not be taken. And so we plunge along on this perilous road without setting any danger signals.

I have heard able socialistic speeches made upon the floor, none abler than the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] can make; but I have never heard a Member of Congress during my long period of service here who has had enough courage to rise in his place on this floor and express dissent from any of the propositions or tendencies to socialism in this country, and the time has now come when you must do it or submit. We must do the things we are now doing in order to win this war. When the war ends it is going to be a difficult matter to maintain our methods of government as they now exist and as they have existed from the days of the founders. It is going to be an easy thing to sink into socialism with all that socialism may mean to the people of the country. While we are making the world safe for democracy we must not make it safe for socialism.

IS THE SOCIALIST PARTY LOYAL?

I do not want my friend from New York to "throw anything at me," and I am sure he will not say that I am a "demagogue" if I question the loyalty to this Government in this present crisis of the party he represents here in this body. So I am simply going to read from recent declarations as expressed by them in their emergency convention held here in the United States just after we declared war.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. RAINEY. I prefer not to yield now.

Mr. LONDON. I would ask the gentleman as a favor to yield to me at this moment.

Mr. RAINEY. I will do anything for the gentleman as a favor except to agree to follow the gentleman in his socialistic career.

Mr. LONDON. The word "recent" in connection with the war will not be applicable to that statement. That statement was adopted a short time after the declaration of war—a few days—in the excitement in the change of the national situation.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman is right. When I said that it was a recent declaration I did not mean that. I meant, and I think I said, that I am about to read the declaration of the principles of the Socialist Party in the United States, which immediately followed our entry into this war, and it was made while the declaration of a state of war was being discussed and unanimously approved by the loyal citizens of the United States. Mr. Speaker, the Socialists are splendidly organized; they can get their conventions together quickly, and the 200 men who assembled in that emergency convention to prepare a platform for the Socialists of the country, in the dangerous emergency which confronted this Nation, spoke for the Socialists of the Nation, and they have had no further meetings since in which they have revoked their position or their doctrines. These are their serious pronunciamentos, the planks in their war platform. With reference to our recent declaration of war, with the news still going over the wires every day that in violation of all moral law, in violation of all treaties, in violation of all laws of the seas, Americans were being murdered upon the seas, in spite of the fact that at that very moment great ships with the American flag painted upon their sides were lying at the bottom of the British Channel, sunk by a treacherous enemy, while claiming to be our friend, they said in this convention of theirs, referring to our entry into the war—and I quote the exact language:

Our entry into this war is a crime against the people of the United States and the nations of the world.

That is what the Socialists of this country stood for then; that is what they stand for this day. I have heard no repudiation of that principle from the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], who represents all the Socialists in the United States here in this body. Is that consonant with loyalty? Will any loyal body of the citizens of the United States agree to such a proposition as that? With the spectacle of bleeding Belgium, of unfortunate Serbia, presented to us, with the news of the outraging of women and the murder of children coming to us every day, while the red glow of the burning villages of Belgium covered the skies, they say that our entry into the war was a crime against nations. A crime against what nation? Was it a crime against unfortunate Belgium? Was it a crime against bleeding Serbia? Was it a crime against the people of northern France being cruelly murdered by the merciless invaders? The proclamation proceeds, and I quote again the exact language of this latest Socialistic platform in the United States:

In all modern history there has been no war more unjustifiable than the war in which we are about to engage.

I know my friend would not charge me with being a demagogue. I do not say such expressions are disloyal. It is unnecessary for me to say that—it is unnecessary for any loyal citizen to say that—but that language speaks for itself. It spoke for itself at that time and has spoken for itself throughout the months that have passed since it was first uttered.

I proceed to read again from this latest platform of the Socialist Party of the United States. They proceed then to pronounce against the delusions——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAINEY. After referring to the delusions of so-called defensive wars, they say—and I quote again:

The only struggle which would justify the workers in taking up arms is a struggle of the working class of the world to free itself from economic exploitation and political oppression.

In other words, the Socialists of these United States are pledged by this platform against this war. They are pledged by this platform to engage in no war except a war which permits them to take up arms against their own exploitation here in this country and against the political oppression which they may find here. Many of them came here from the oppressed sections of other countries and they seem to have become leaders of the Socialists of the United States, and they come here claiming in this convention that the only fight the Socialists of the United States will make is a fight against this great Government; that they will take up arms in this Nation for the purpose, and for the purpose alone, of overcoming the present method of doing things here. Now, is that loyalty to this Government or is that disloyalty? You know and the country knows what that is, and I am not here for the purpose of designating what that is.

Any patriotic citizen of the United States knows whether that sort of an argument, whether that sort of a platform, is loyal or disloyal. It comes as near grazing the edge of treason as any expression I have heard in this country from any one man or from any body of men. And so, unless we are careful, this world menace of Socialism, plausibly proceeding and gaining ground slowly and in an unalarming manner, is the real issue of the future.

PRESENT AND FUTURE ISSUES.

We have been divided here in the United States upon the question of the tariff. We never got out of the protective tariff more than the sum of $333,000,000 a year in the peak year of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. We attempted to reduce the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill to $280,000,000. As a matter of fact, in our peak year under the Underwood bill, until the war interrupted its procedure, we got $225,000,000 a year. A tariff bill can be arranged by imposing maximum rates upon all schedules which will yield $400,000,000 and that will not mean protection. It will mean that certain schedules must be lowered. It will not mean free trade, but will mean certain schedules must be higher, but as compared to the stupendous budget which will confront this country when this war is over the question of a protective tariff or a tariff for revenue only is from a standpoint of revenue absolutely negligible. If this war continues three or four years longer—and it will in all probability—if this war continues that much longer we have staring us in the face, if we retire a billion and a half dollars of bonds a year, and we must retire that much—we have staring us in the face an annual budget of, how much? An annual budget of $6,000,000,000, and the $80,000,000 of tariff fluctuation we can get for the Treasury or take out of the Treasury is absolutely negligible.

If the parties in this country as at present organized continue these mock battles of theirs upon issues which are now absolutely academic, upon little issues that do not deserve consideration in this present great age of the world—when the world is being made over—if they continue that sort of course, they will find confronting both of them the specter of socialism in this land as well as throughout the world. The question is, Are you ready for it? Do you stand for the things that Russian socialism—and that is the only nation that has ever had an opportunity to express itself upon this question—do you stand for the things they stand for in Russia, or are you opposed to them?

Do not deceive yourselves. The old order is changing in the world. These new issues are presenting themselves with great force, and they must be met. And it is the province of the political parties of this country to express themselves along these lines and to get ready when this war is over to lower the floodgates; to return, if they can, to the sane methods of holding property; to adhere to sane methods of holding land; to reestablish and maintain the methods of administering the affairs of the people of this Republic under which we have prospered and progressed—the methods which have prevailed in the world since the birth of the modern state. [Applause.]

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. CALDWELL, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Lizzie Yarker, H. R. 9344, Sixty-fourth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. BROWNE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of John P. Chesley, no adverse report having been made thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SUFFRAGE RESOLUTION.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution No. 1, a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women, be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that House joint resolution No. 1 be laid on the table.

Mr. WEBB. Otherwise the calendar would have to carry it for the remainder of the session, and nobody wants that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, let me inquire if permission has been granted to adjourn over until Monday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; it has.

Mr. RAINEY. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, January 14, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our hearts are saddened as we come together by the news of the death of another Member of this Senate. We thank Thee for the life and character of the distinguished Senator who has gone from our midst. We will cherish his memory. He was among us who served faithfully and devotedly the interests of his country, kind and generous in his friendships, patriotic, and consecrated to the highest ideals of Christian civilization. We pray that Thou wilt impress us this day with the great fact that in the midst of life we are in death, that we may catch the inspirations of life from the sweet memories that linger with us of those who have gone before us and conform our lives to the Divine ideals, that we may be ready for the passage into that eternal world beyond. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last when, on request of Mr. MARTIN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] I ask that he be excused from further service as a member and chairman of the Committee on Immigration, and at the request of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] I ask that he be excused from further service as a member and chairman of the Committee on Industrial Expositions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent that the following committee assignments may be made. I send the order to the desk and ask that it may have immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That Senator SMITH of South Carolina be appointed chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce;

That Senator HARDWICK be appointed chairman of the Committee on Immigration;

That Senator CHAMBERLAIN be appointed a member of the Committee on Coast Defenses;

That Senator JAMES be appointed a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce; and

That Senator JOHNSON of South Dakota be appointed a member of the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2316) to promote export trade, and for other purposes, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WEBB, Mr. CARLIN, and Mr. VOLSTEAD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 6176. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va.; and

H. R. 8496. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 6176. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 8496. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DEATH OF SENATOR JAMES H. BRADY.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it becomes my painful duty to announce the death of my colleague, which took place in this city at his home yesterday at 6.30 p. m.

This is not the time, Mr. President, to enter upon a discussion of the life and services of Mr. BRADY. On some future day I shall ask the Senate to set aside a time to consider his life and public services.

For the present, Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions and ask for their consideration.

The resolutions were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Senate resolution 182.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, late a Senator from the State of Idaho.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for superintending the funeral of the late Senator.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The Vice President, under the second resolution, appointed the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] as the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the dead, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 15, 1918, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, source of all our longings, hopes, and aspirations, strengthen our arm of faith, that we may draw near to Thee, be inspired with brighter hopes, a deeper, purer love for Thee and our fellow men; that selfishness may depart, evil cease, and brotherly love prevail; that godliness may enrich the heart, the home, society, the Nation, wars vanish, and the world become a better dwelling place for all classes and conditions of men.

To the glory and honor of Thy Holy Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 11, 1918, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, Mr. EVANS, of Montana, is detained at home this morning in his apartment on account of sickness. I want to ask that he be excused for a week on that account.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS] be excused for one week on account of sickness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. SINNOTT, was granted leave of absence for an indefinite period on account of sickness.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. LEVER, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WHALEY on account of serious illness of his brother.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the Record a very brief statement from the New York Times relative to the meeting of the New York Bar Association on Saturday night, in which a statement appears from Mr. Hughes relative to the moral and eloquent leadership of President Wilson.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file the report on the Indian appropriation bill at any time before 12 o'clock to-night, as if the House were in session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to file the report on the Indian appropriation bill at any time before 12 o'clock midnight, whether the House is in session or not. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas reserves all points of order on the bill.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following letter, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 12, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives:

I hereby ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Mary M. Murray, no adverse report having been made thereon.

EDWARD E. BROWNE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the permission will be granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Before the gentleman begins, the Chair wishes to announce again that the easy way and the short way to get leave of absence is to write a slip out and give it to the Clerk. We will get through a heap quicker.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I notice that every day Members submit requests to withdraw papers from the file room. I wonder why this is, when Members can go there and withdraw them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand the rule to be that if an adverse report has been made, the files can not be taken out. If an adverse report has not been made, the files can be taken out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] expounded that question once, but I have forgotten the reason he gave.

Mr. FOSTER. They can not get the papers unless the bill to which they refer has already been introduced and is before the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I know what the prevailing and controlling reason is, that in the case of a bill on which an adverse report has been made the papers can not be taken from the files.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I would like to inquire if they can be withdrawn, even with the consent of the House, when an adverse report has been made?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not without leaving copies.

The SPEAKER. Is the answer of the gentleman from Kansas satisfactory?

Mr. ASHBROOK. It is partially so.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. HAMLIN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for not to exceed 30 minutes, when the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] shall have finished, on the subject of the war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on the subject of the war. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I have the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]? I understand that after the speeches scheduled for to-day there is going to be no other business before the House?

Mr. KITCHIN. We expect to adjourn out of respect to the memory of the late Senator BRADY from Idaho.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, may I have five minutes before the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that he wait until to-morrow.

Mr. HAMLIN. At the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to wait until to-morrow.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman can get time on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. If I can get it on the discussion of the Indian appropriation bill, I will withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri withdraw his request?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] desire to make any request?

Mr. TREADWAY. No, Mr. Speaker; I will defer my request as the gentleman from Missouri has done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, in the President's proclamation taking over the railroads for the duration of the war there is an assertion of power by him and attempted to be delegated to the Director General of Railroads which should receive the attention of Congress and the country. I refer to that paragraph of the proclamation reading as follows:

> Until and except so far as said director shall from time to time otherwise by general or special orders determine, such systems of transportation shall remain subject to all existing statutes and orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission and to all statutes and orders of regulating commissions of the various States in which said systems or any part thereof may be situated. But any orders, general or special, hereafter made by said director shall have paramount authority and be obeyed as such.

This is a declaration upon the part of the President that during the time the railroads of the United States shall be in his possession in behalf of the Government all statutes of the United States, all orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all statutes of the various States and orders of State commissions relating to railroads may be suspended by him, acting through the Director General whom he has appointed. I confidently assert that no such power has been delegated to him and none can exist unless expressly delegated by Congress. If this power does exist the Interstate Commerce Commission may be deprived of all of its functions by the Director General except the drawing of their salaries. The safety appliance acts, the boiler-inspection act, the hours-of-service act, the eight-hour law, the statutes providing for reasonable rates and prohibiting discrimination, all can be suspended if the Director General shall so order.

I do not now propose to discuss whether such a power should be delegated to the President, but only the question of whether it has been delegated. The power exercised by the President in taking over the railroads is declared in the proclamation to be founded upon the acts of Congress declaring a state of war to exist between the United States and the Imperial German Government and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, and by section 1 of the act approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes." The last-named act, so far as it relates to this subject, reads as follows:

> The President, in time of war, is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same to the exclusion, as far as may be necessary, of all other traffic thereon for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material, and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable.

The power conferred by this act is plainly stated. It is to take possession and assume control of the railroads and utilize the same to the exclusion, so far as may be necessary, of all other traffic thereon for the purposes named. There is no language in this act from which any implication can be drawn that the President is given power to set aside or suspend any existing statutes relating to railroads. I think I am safe in asserting that when this act was passed no Member of Congress ever dreamed that under it a power to set aside the laws enacted by Congress would be asserted. While there are certain statutes affecting railroads that will not affect them while in possession of the Government, it is not because of any power of the President to suspend them, but only because under the now existing conditions they are no longer applicable. A most important illustration of this is the statute against pooling. This statute can not be set aside or suspended, but it will have no applicability so long as the railroads are in the possession of the United States, for while they are in this condition there is for practical purposes but one single control expressly authorized by Congress and therefore there can be no diversified interests to be pooled. Exactly the same situation would arise if Congress should authorize one single Federal corporation to take over all of the railroads of the United States, and that corporation did so. The statutes of the United States in that case against pooling would not apply to the business of that corporation, for there would be no competition and no other railroad with which a pooling agreement might be made. Therefore, as in the present case, while the antipooling statute would remain it would not apply; but the statutes of the United States providing for the safety of the public and railway employees, the prevention of unjust and discriminatory rates, and delegating to a tribunal of the United States the power and duty of enforcing these statutes, still stand with full force and effect.

Although I do not know upon what particular ground this power is asserted, I assume that it may be based upon the general principle that the sovereign authority is not bound by the general words of a statute unless expressly named therein, and that it may be argued upon this principle that the various statutes of the United States relating to railroads, inasmuch as they do not expressly name the United States being bound by them, if it should own or control a railroad, that the United States is not bound. But while the doctrine is sometimes stated in as broad language as I have just put it, it is subject to very important qualifications, and these qualifications clearly take the present case out of the principle. The correct rule is that where general words in a statute would, if the sovereign was included, divest it of any prerogative, right, title, or interest which it theretofore had, then, and in that case, the sovereign will not be deemed to be included in the general words, but where general words are used in a statute the purpose and object of which is to promote the public welfare and prevent injury and wrong, then and in that case the sovereign authority is deemed to be included in such general words without being expressly named therein. If then I have stated the correct rule, it is plain that the statutes that I have specifically named were enacted to promote the public welfare and prevent injury and wrong and that they are in full force and effect against the United States in the operation of railroads and as completely as when the railroads were under private operation. That the correct rule is as I have just stated it has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States in numerous cases. In the case of the United States v. Knight (14 Pet., 301), the construction of an act of Congress was under consideration, and the question was whether such act applied to the United States. The language of the act, so far as it pertains to this question, was as follows:

> And be it further enacted, That writs of execution and other final process, issued on judgments and decrees rendered in any of the courts of the United States, and the proceedings thereupon shall be the same except their style in each State as are now used in the courts of such State.

With a provision—

> That it shall be in the power of the courts if they see fit in their discretion, by rules of court, so far to alter final process in said courts as to conform the same to any change which may be adopted by the legislatures of the respective States for the State courts.

The court said:

> It is first objected that whatsoever may be the construction of this section, as now governing executions in case of other parties, yet it does not embrace those issued on judgments rendered in favor of the United States; and this upon the ground that the United States are never to be considered as embraced in any statute, unless expressly named.
> The words of this section being, "that writs of execution and other final process, issued on judgments and decrees rendered in any of the courts of the United States," it is obvious that the language is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace them, unless they are to be excluded by a construction founded upon the principle just stated. In Bacon's Abridgment (title "Prerogative," 3–5), it is said that the general rule is that where an act of Parliament is made for the public good, the advancement of religion and justice, and to prevent injury and wrong, the King shall be bound by such act, though not particularly named therein. But where a statute is general, and thereby any prerogative, right, title, or interest is divested, or taken from the King, in such case he shall not be bound; unless the statute is made by express words to extend to him. It is a settled principle that the King is not, ordinarily, barred, unless named by an act of limitations. The principle expressed in the maxim nullum tempus occurrit regi rests upon the ground that no laches shall be imputed to him. The doctrine that the Government should not, unless named, be bound by an act of limitations is in accordance with that just cited from Bacon, because if bound it would be barred of a right; and in all such cases is not to be construed to be embraced unless named, or, what would be equivalent, unless the language is such as to show clearly that such was the intent of the act. The same principle has been decided in New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and no doubt in other States; and all upon the same ground. Not upon any notion of prerogative, for even in England, where the doctrine is stated under the head of prerogative, this in effect means nothing more than that this exception is made from the statute for the public good, and the King represents the nation. The real ground is a great principle of public policy, which belongs alike to all governments, that the public interests should not be prejudiced by the negligence of public officers, to whose care they are confided. Without undertaking to lay down any general rule as applicable to cases of this kind we feel satisfied that when, as in this case, a statute which proposes only to regulate the mode of proceeding in suits, does not divest the public of any right, does not violate any principle of public policy; but, on the contrary, makes provisions in accordance with the policy which the Government has indicated by many acts of previous legislation, to conform to State laws, to giving to persons imprisoned under their execution the privilege of jail limits; we shall best carry into effect the legislative intent by construing the executions at the suit of the United States to be embraced within the act of 1828.

Now, while this is very technical, the case that I have now cited and read, and quoted from the opinion of, is clearly upon all fours with the discussion that I am discussing. There was a statute in general language. The question there was whether the United States was included within the general language of the statute, just as we have here the question whether the United States is included in the general language of the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I quite agree with the views which the gentleman has forcibly and clearly expressed, and my understanding is that there are many other lawyers who also agree. This was clearly intimated by Senator CUMMINS the other day in the hearings before the joint committee, when he inquired of one of the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission what would be left of the laws and the Constitution under the President's order. My understanding is that the commissioner was somewhat at a loss for a reply.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has made a very careful study of this question, but I want to ask him if it is his opinion that in a case where the Commander in Chief was engaged in the movement of our troops he would be bound by the provisions, for instance, of the eight-hour law, and that the progress of the troops while being moved would have to be interfered with because he was bound to observe the eight-hour law as a safety-appliance act.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very frank to say to the gentleman that that presents a different question, and one which I do not propose to discuss to-day; but there is a distinction between the control and the operation of the railroads in carrying out the purely military purposes of the Government and the carrying on of the ordinary functions of the railroads, so far as private shippers are concerned.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Was not that distinction made in the act under which the President is now acting?

Mr. LENROOT. It certainly is expressly stated that the President may use the same for these military purposes, to the exclusion of all other business.

But, going on with my legal argument—because this is merely a legal argument—this same doctrine was approved in the case of United States v. Herron (20 Wal., 251). In this case, however, unlike the Knight case, if the United States had been deemed to be included in the general language, it would have divested it of one of its prerogatives, and there was nothing in the case to bring it within the qualifications of a statute whose object was to promote the public welfare and prevent injury and wrong, but in this case the correct doctrine is stated by the court as follows:

It is a maxim of the common law—

Said Savage, chief justice—

that when an act of Parliament is passed for the public good, as for the advancement of religion and justice, or to prevent injury and wrong, the King shall be bound by such act, though not named, but when a statute is general and any prerogative, right, or interest would be divested or taken from the King, in such a case he shall not be bound unless the statute is made by express words to extend to him, for which he cites both English and American authorities, and adds that the people of the State, being sovereign, have succeeded to the rights of the former sovereign, and that the people of the State are not bound by the general words in the insolvent law. (People v. Herkimer, 4 Cow, 348; see also Com. v. Hutchinson, 10 Pa., 466, which is to the same effect; Hilliard Bank (2d ed., 295.)

Sanctioned as that principle is by two express decisions of this court, it would seem that further discussion of it is unnecessary, as it has never been questioned by any well-considered case, State or Federal, and is founded in the presumption that the legislature, if they intended to divest the sovereign power of any right, privilege, title, or interest, would say so in express words; and where the act contains no words to express such an intent, that it will be presumed that the intent does not exist. (U. S. v. Knight, 14 Pet., 315; Bk. v. U. S., decided at the present term (ante), 80; U. S. v. Hoar, 2 Mass., 311; Com. v. Baldwin, 1 Watts, 54.)

Every State court, so far as I can find, that has had occasion to consider this subject has laid down the same doctrine, that any statute whose object is to promote the public welfare and prevent injury and wrong binds the sovereign as well as the people, even though not expressly named, and it is only statutes where the sovereign, if included, would be divested of some prerogative, right, title, or interest, that it must be expressly named. It is true that in some of the cases there is general language stating the general rule without qualifications, but in all such cases the facts making the qualification were not present. Such a case is that of the Guaranty Title & Trust Co. against The Title, Guaranty & Surety Co., Two hundred and twenty-fourth United States, 151, but it is to be observed that in this case the decision in United States against Herron, which I have just quoted, was approved, and in this case the sole question was that of whether the United States, as a creditor, was bound by certain provisions of the bankruptcy law. The court very properly held that "the general language in the statute did not include the United States." To have included it would have divested it of a prerogative and right that it theretofore had.

It seems entirely clear, then, that, so far as the act of Congress of August 29, 1916, is concerned, empowering the President to take over the railroads, no power has been delegated to him by that act to set aside or suspend any of the statutes of the United States such as I have specifically named and others whose object is to safeguard the public welfare and prevent injury and wrong. The United States is as much bound by the provisions of these statutes as the railroads were when in the possession of private owners.

One other question then presents itself and that is whether the powers delegated to the President by Congress in the declaration of war against Germany and Austria conferred any power to set aside or suspend the statutes in question. I think that it can be completely demonstrated that they do not. The power delegated to the President in these declarations is in the following language:

And that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government.

It may be claimed that the power to employ the resources of the Government to carry on the war carries with it the power to suspend the statutes of the United States if he shall deem it necessary to carry on the war. No such power can be implied from the language used. It seems to me entirely clear that the proper construction of this language is that the President is authorized and directed to employ the resources of the Government to carry on the war, but not in violation of any existing law. Assume for the purpose of argument that the railroads of the United States when taken possession of by the United States become resources of the United States, the President can no more use them in violation of existing law than any other resource of the United States in violation of existing law. To illustrate: Congress prior to the declaration of war passed most of the annual appropriation bills, appropriating more than $1,000,000,000 for various purposes. The amount of money in the Treasury necessary to meet these appropriations is a resource of the United States, but a resource which Congress by law has decreed should be used for certain specific purposes. Will anyone claim that the delegation of power to the President to employ the resources of the United States to carry on the war authorizes him to nullify and set aside as he might see fit the annual appropriation laws enacted by Congress?

Mr. SINNOTT. I have not heard all of the gentleman's remarks. Has he referred to the statute which the President has suspended?

Mr. LENROOT. He has not suspended any. He has merely asserted the power to suspend, the right to suspend, and the priority of any orders issued by the Director General of Railroads over any statute relating to railroads, and has directed that they be obeyed as such.

Again, the public lands of the United States containing coal and oil are, of course, resources of the Government. We have laws providing for their disposition. Public lands containing coal under these laws can not be sold for less than their appraised value. Would it be claimed that under the power to use the resources of the Government to prosecute the war the President could set aside or suspend these laws and sell all the coal lands of the United States for any price that he chose? No one, of course, would make any such claim, and it is therefore easily demonstrated that under the power to use the resources of the Government he could only use them in accordance with existing law, and this principle applies to railroads as well as coal lands. Upon mature reflection it seems to me that no one can claim that the power to employ the resources of the Government to carry on the war carries with it a power to set aside or suspend any of the laws of the United States.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CANTRILL. As I understand the gentleman, he makes some objection to the method of the President. The gentleman's time is about to expire, so I wish to ask him—the gentleman favors, of course, the complete Federal control of railroads?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; and I favor the President's action in taking over the railroads.

Mr. CANTRILL. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. LENROOT. I am simply discussing the question of method.

Mr. CANTRILL. But you are not opposed to it?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, not at all. I am just coming to that.

Mr. CANTRILL. The gentleman knows, of course, that his party is committed to complete Federal control of railroads?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, well, I will not discuss that with the gentleman. Whether or not the President should have the power to suspend any of these statutes in order to more efficiently carry on railroad transportation is a matter that should be settled by Congress, and it should act only upon complete information as to the necessity of delegating such power. The Interstate Commerce Commission is a tribunal created by Congress for the enforcement of these statutes. The functions now exercised by them should continue to be so exercised until it is clearly shown that the public interest and the successful prosecution of the war demands that the Director General of Railroads should be clothed with these great powers. It is no answer to say that the Director General will not abuse the power that is claimed for him. Congress is the direct representative of the people, and any powers not directly vested in the executive officers of the Government by the Constitution necessary to win this war should come from Congress. Congress has freely granted all necessary powers in this regard in the past that have been asked for by the administration. Congress will continue to do so in the future, but the assertion of a power to set aside or suspend the statutes of the United States by the executive department of this Government without lawful authority so to do should challenge the serious consideration of Congress and of the country.

I sincerely hope that the executive department of the Government, upon reflection, will not assert any of the powers it has claimed in this matter, and that if further power is needed it will secure it in a lawful way by coming to Congress for it. [Applause.]

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 3223. An act providing for the continuance of the Osage Indian School, Oklahoma, for a period of 13 years from January 1, 1918; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 2052. An act authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, late a Senator from the State of Idaho.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for superintending the funeral of the late Senator.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator the Senate do now adjourn.

And that in compliance with the foregoing resolution the Vice President had appointed Mr. BORAH, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. HARDING, Mr. WARREN, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. KING, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. BECKHAM as said committee.

DEATH OF SENATOR BRADY.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sorrowful duty to announce the death of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, the junior Senator from Idaho, who passed away at his home in this city last evening after an illness of one week. Senator BRADY was held in affectionate regard by the Members of the Senate and by those in this body who enjoyed an acquaintance with him, many of whom will desire to bear witness to his patriotic devotion to his country and his wise and intelligent counsel in legislative affairs; but this is not an appropriate time to eulogize his splendid life and accomplishments.

The House will be requested at a later date to suspend temporarily its business in order that well-deserved tributes may be paid to his high character and distinguished public service.

I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PARK). The gentleman from Idaho offers a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 223.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, a Senator of the United States from the State of Idaho.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members be appointed on the part of the House to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House now adjourn.

The resolutions were agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as the committee on the part of the House Mr. DILL, Mr. FRENCH, Mr. SMITH of Idaho, Mr. DILLON, Mr. HILLIARD, Mr. EVANS, Mr. GANDY, Mr. MAYS, Mr. ROBERTS, Mr. ROMJUE, Mr. WALSH, Mr. AUSTIN, Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD, Mr. RAKER, and Mr. MCARTHUR.

In accordance with the resolution, the House (at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Tuesday, January 15, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the United States Food Administrator submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $10,000,000 required for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 786); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of State submitting a proposed draft of an act to amend section 2 of the act of February 5, 1915 (38 Stat., 805) (H. Doc. No. 787); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting annual report of expenditures for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 788); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting two statements, one covering "sale of surplus and obsolete material and equipment during the year ended June 30, 1917," and the other "collections from town-site assessments to June 30, 1917" (H. Doc. No. 789); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of expenditures on account of appropriation "Contingencies of the Army" during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 790); to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of expenditures on account of appropriation for contingent expenses of the War Department during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 791); to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of State submitting supplemental estimate of appropriations required by the State Department for expenses of the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 792); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the president of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. transmitting report of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. for the year 1917 (H. Doc. No. 793); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

9. A letter from the vice president of the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator & Railroad Co., transmitting report of the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator & Railroad Co. for the year ending December 31, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 794); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

10. A letter from the president of the United States Civil Service Commission, transmitting certain schedules of useless papers in the office of the secretaries of the fourth, eleventh, and twelfth civil-service districts, and in the office of the labor board at the Norfolk (Va.) Navy Yard, which are not needed in the transaction of public business and are of no permanent value or historical interest (H. Doc. No. 795); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

11. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the chairman of the United States Shipping Board submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the United States Shipping Board for the construction of ships, fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 796); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

12. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the War Department for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 797); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

13. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a proposed paragraph of legislation for inclusion in the urgent deficiency bill (H. Doc. No. 798); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

14. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the War Department for fortifications, etc., Panama Canal (H. Doc. No. 799); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

15. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriations required by the United States Geological Survey for "Examination and classification of lands for homesteads," fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 800); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

16. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Navy Department for rent of building, fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 801); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

17. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the War Department for increase in salaries of certain employees of the Army War College for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 802); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

18. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the chairman of the United States Shipping Board submitting a proposed change in the wording of the estimates of appropriations for acquisition of plants suitable for shipbuilding, etc., for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 803); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

19. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Reclamation Service for secondary projects, cooperative and other miscellaneous investigations, for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 804); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. NOLAN, from the Committee on Labor, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 152) to fix the compensation of certain employees of the United States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 239), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8696), making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 240), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MAPES: A bill (H. R. 8695) to increase pensions of certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma: A bill (H. R. 8696) making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919; to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 8697) granting an increase of pension to John H. Day; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8698) granting an increase of pension to James H. Kiste; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8699) granting a pension to Sarah A. Trauger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, memorial of the Topeka Chamber of Commerce, favoring repeal of the second-class postage provision of the revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. VARE: Memorial of the city council of Philadelphia, Pa., against abolition of pneumatic mail tubes in Philadelphia; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, memorial of the Federal Employees Union, No 23, customs service, Philadelphia, favoring passage of the Keating and Nolan bills; to the Committee on Appropriations.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 15, 1918.

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, give unto us grace to meet the solemn responsibilities of this day, and when we come to its close may we cease with the comforting satisfaction of having accomplished God's will and of having filled up the measure of the day with the largest possible amount of usefulness on the part of every one of us. Guide us by Thine own unerring counsel into the larger life. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

THE SHIPPING SITUATION.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that to-morrow morning immediately after the close of the routine morning business I shall ask permission of the Senate to submit some remarks concerning the shipping situation of the world to-day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the death of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, late a Senator from the State of Idaho.

SURPLUS AND OBSOLETE MATERIAL (H. DOC. NO. 789).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, statements covering the sale of surplus and obsolete material and equipment during the year ended June 30, 1917, and collections from town site assessments to June 30, 1917, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SCHOOLS IN ALASKA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement relative to the transfers of moneys from "The proceeds of town sites for schools and other improvements, Alaska," and "Construction and operation of railroads in Alaska," which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CONSTRUCTION OF ROADS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of expenditures for the fiscal year 1917, out of the funds appropriated for the survey, construction, and maintenance of roads and trails within or only partly within the national forests, together with a report of the expenditures for the construction of rural post roads under the Federal aid road act, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

FOOD PRODUCTS (H. DOC. NO. 785).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, a detailed report of the expenditure of all moneys from the period from August 10 to November 15, 1917, appropriated under the act "to provide for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

LIST OF CLAIMS (S. DOC. NO. 162).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting, pursuant to the order of the court, a list of cases referred to the Court of Claims by the United States Senate under the act of March 3, 1887, commonly known as the Tucker Act, and dismissed by the court November 12, 1917, on motion of the defendants, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

GEORGETOWN BARGE, DOCK, ELEVATOR & RAILWAY CO. (H. DOC. NO. 794).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator & Railway Co. for the year ended December 31, 1917, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	James	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Smoot
Fernald	Kenyon	Robinson	Swanson
Fletcher	Kirby	Saulsbury	Townsend
France	Knox	Shafroth	Trammell
Gronna	McCumber	Sheppard	Vardaman
Hale	McNary	Shields	Wadsworth
Harding	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] are detained on important public business.

Mr. JAMES. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BECKHAM] is absent on official business.

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to announce the continued absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of illness.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan], who reports that he is storm bound on his way to Washington. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. JOHNSON of California answered to his name when called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is unavoidably detained from the Senate and that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is absent on official business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. COLT entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. REED, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. NEW, Mr. WEEKS, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. POMERENE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the Trades and Labor Council of Lansing, Mich., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FERNALD presented resolutions adopted by the Maine Sportsmen's Fish and Game Protective Association, favoring the enactment of legislation relative to the proper protection of migratory birds, which were referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have two telegrams, one from C. M. Day, editor of the Argus, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., and the other from W. R. Ronald, publisher of the Daily Republican, of Mitchell, S. Dak., relative to the control of the print-paper industry, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SIOUX FALLS, S. DAK., January 14, 1918.

Hon. E. S. JOHNSON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

South Dakota publishers who have suffered terribly from extortionate prices of print paper are to a man in favor of Smith resolution giving Federal Trade Commission power to regulate the price of print paper. Manufacturers are planning further aggressions if this resolution fails.

C. M. DAY, Editor Argus Leader.

MITCHELL, S. DAK., January 14, 1918.

Hon. ED. JOHNSON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Permit me respectfully to urge you to support the Smith resolution for control of print-paper industry. Twelve hundred papers were forced out of business last year, yet papers are called upon constantly to help the Government in war activities. Are they not entitled to protection against a combine so unscrupulous as was shown in evidence in recent hearing in United States court at New York? Publishers want only justice and mills can suffer no injury at the hands of the Trade Commission.

W. R. RONALD,
Publisher Daily Republican.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3387) to authorize and empower the President to create military zones around shipyards where vessels are under construction for the United States, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 190) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3388) to amend the emergency shipping fund provisions of the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved June 30, 1917, so as to empower the President and his designated agents to take over certain transportation systems for the transportation of shipyard and plant employees, and for other purposes (Rept. NAVAL OIL SUPPLY.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, at the last session of the Senate I presented a bill relative to the production, use, and conservation of oil and gas in naval petroleum reserves. The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] objected to the introduction of the bill, and under the rule it went over one day. At that time I moved that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

I now ask that the bill be read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

I should like to say in this connection that the Senator from Utah, as I understand, objects to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs and desires that it be sent to the Committee on Public Lands. As I understand the rules of the Senate, there is no rule affecting the reference of bills, except Rule XVI, which provides, under certain conditions, how an appropriation bill shall be referred; that bills making appropriations for the Navy shall be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and so forth.

This bill affects lands that had been set aside by an order of the President in 1912, exclusively for the use and benefit of the Navy. That is the language under which this land was originally set aside. This bill proposes to condemn this land; that is, to condemn a portion of the land that has become private and for which patent has been issued, to pay for it, and to let the entire land be developed by the Navy in order to secure oil and conserve it.

As I understand, the contention of the Senator from Utah is that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, the Senator claiming that the lands affected are public lands. I should like to make this distinction, that, while they are governmental lands, they are not public lands. As I understand, public lands are lands that are open to entry by the public. A navy yard is governmental land, but it is not public land; that is, the public has no right under the Pickett Act and other acts to make any entry on the land embraced within the naval reserves as public lands. They have been set aside for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy; they are subject to use by the Navy, and, consequently, are within the control of the Navy. Therefore the proper reference of this bill is to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

In addition to that, I desire to say that this bill should go to a committee that is friendly. If the Senate is friendly to the protection of the naval reserves and desires them to be used for the benefit of the Navy, and it has the authority to refer bills to suit itself, the proper committee to have jurisdiction of the bill under the rules and precedents of the Senate is the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator state just how these lands became naval reserve lands?

Mr. SWANSON. The President by proclamation—I think in September, 1909—set aside certain lands from public entry as a reserve. Then, on June 25, 1910, the Pickett Act sustained the right to exclude these lands from public entry and authorized the President to set aside lands for naval and other purposes. In 1912 the President set aside these lands for the Navy as a naval reserve, using the language "for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy." This bill does not affect any lands except those that have been set aside "for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then these lands, by due legal procedure, under acts of the President and under acts of Congress, are now naval reserve lands?

Mr. SWANSON. Absolutely, and nothing else. They have been set aside "for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And what the Senator asks is that they all be handled and that legislation with reference to them be handled by the Naval Committee?

Mr. SWANSON. By the Naval Committee, like a navy yard or any other property pertaining to the Navy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Georgia will not make up his mind on that question until I call his particular attention to the language of the bill.

I am rather surprised at the statement which has been made by the Senator from Virginia. The Senator says that these lands are not public lands; that included in the area are some lands within the withdrawn area to which title has been secured, and therefore they are not public lands. Mr. President, all I ask Senators to do is to read the bill. Perhaps I had better read portions of the bill so that the Senate will see exactly what it provides:

That the absolute title and right of possession to any oil or gas lands within the exterior boundaries of naval petroleum reserve No. 1, in California, as defined and established by Executive order dated September 2, 1912, naval petroleum reserve No. 2, in California, as defined and established by Executive order dated December 13, 1912, and naval petroleum reserve No. 3, in Wyoming, as defined and established by Executive order dated April 30, 1915, together with any oil and gas wells, machinery, equipment, appliances, and other property on, useful for, and incidental to the production, storage, transportation, refining, use, protection, and conservation of oil and gas on or in connection with said lands shall become vested in the United States upon the issuance from time to time by the President of an Executive order or proclamation to that effect, containing a description of said lands and other property; and thereupon it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to take possession of all properties so vested in the United States—to conserve, develop, use, and operate the same in his discretion, directly or by contract, lease, or otherwise, and to use, store, exchange, refine, sell, or otherwise dispose of the oil and gas products thereof for the benefit of the United States.

SEC. 2. That all moneys derived from the operations conducted under the preceding section shall constitute an operating fund which shall be used by the Secretary of the Navy for continued operations of the same character; that this fund shall be reimbursed from the proper appropriations on account of the oil and gas products from said properties used by the United States at actual cost; and that any sums not required for such purposes of operation shall be covered into the Treasury as general receipts.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to employ such persons, purchase such equipment and supplies, make such contracts, erect and maintain such structures, and prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary in his judgment to enable him to carry into effect the provisions of this act; and for such purposes there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available immediately and until expended.

SEC. 4. That the President is hereby authorized, in such manner as he may direct, to agree with any claimant or owner of any property taken under this act upon a division of lands or the proceeds of operation, upon any exchange of lands without the naval petroleum reserves for lands within the reserves, or upon a compensation in money for the relinquishment or transfer to the United States of any such claim or property, and any amount so agreed upon shall be paid by the Treasurer to such claimant or owner; that in the event of a disagreement upon the amount of compensation to be paid in any case, such amount may be determined by the President, and thereupon the claimant or owner shall be paid 75 per cent of such amount, and shall have the right to recover from the United States such further sum as, added to such 75 per cent, will amount to just compensation.

Mr. President, this question has been before the Public Lands Committee for a great number of years. The Pickett Act, referred to by the Senator, came from the Public Lands Committee, authorizing the President to withdraw these lands. I had the privilege of reporting that act to the Senate. This very question has been reported to the Senate from the Public Lands Committee time and time again, and in my opinion would have been passed but for the disagreement between officials of the Interior Department and the Navy Department.

It is not because the Public Lands Committee is adverse to legislation of this kind that legislation has not been enacted long ago. If this bill was referred to the Public Lands Committee, I have no doubt but that it would report the bill to the Senate, perhaps with some amendments, not interfering in the least with any rights that the Government may have under the withdrawal order of the President, and the Senator does the Public Lands Committee of the Senate an injustice when he implies that it is an unfriendly committee.

Now, however, the Navy Department comes to the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate and selects a member of that committee to introduce the bill and ask that it be referred to the Naval Affairs Committee—a committee that has not had one thing to do with the consideration of legislation of this character in the past. I want to say to the Senator from Virginia that there are hundreds of individual or corporate claimants in the naval reserves, and there are many owners of claims within the reserves, and this bill provides how those claimants shall undertake to secure title to their claims. Not only that, but it actually provides that the owner of an oil claim within the exterior boundaries of one of these petroleum reserves can exchange, if agreeable to the Secretary of the Interior, for public lands outside of the reserve. Does the Naval Affairs Committee have anything to do with public lands? Have they ever had such a bill referred to them? If so, it was before ever I entered this body.

The bill, as I say, goes so far as to authorize the exchange of lands—lands within the reserve, the titles to which there is no question; lands within the reserve, the titles to which have not passed from the Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that we have had bills before us frequently with regard to reservations. We are continually reserving forest lands and taking up lands inside of the forest reserves and putting them back into the public domain for entry, and yet no bill for that purpose has been referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, although that is the committee that has jurisdiction of all matters relating to the administration of forest reserves. When it comes, however, to titles and transfers of the public domain, the Public Lands Committee always has been recognized as having jurisdiction, both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States.

It seems to me that, in view of the fact that this bill deals in that manner with lands that are reserved by proclamation and every bill relating to that subject has been referred to the Committee on Public Lands, they ought to be considered strong precedents for referring this bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President the Senator from Colorado is absolutely correct.

Again, section 5 of this bill provides:

> That in all cases of disagreement mentioned in the preceding section, and in all cases in which the property taken is claimed by the United States independently of this act, appropriate proceedings for determination of the preexisting right and title to such property, and the value thereof if determined not to be the property of the United States independently of this act, shall be promptly instituted by the Attorney General in the name of the United States, or may be instituted by any claimant of such property against the United States, in the respective district courts of the United States for the judicial districts in which such property is situated—

And so forth.

Why, Mr. President, supposing there were a bill introduced into the Senate that had particular reference to the Navy of the United States, and some Senator from the Public Lands Committee introduced it and asked that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The Senator from Virginia would be the very first Senator upon the floor to object, and I would support him. Senate committees are created for the purpose of handling bills and resolutions covering subjects for which the committee was originally created, and this is nothing more than an undertaking on the part of a member of the Naval Affairs Committee to take from the Public Lands Committee of the Senate a subject matter that the Public Lands Committee has considered for years, and a matter that would have been settled years ago if it had not been for the dispute between officials of two departments of our Government. If this bill does not go to the Public Lands Committee there is no bill that ought to go there affecting the public lands of this country.

Mr. President, I wish the Senators were present so that they could hear what is being said in relation to this matter, for I know that no Senator who reads the bill and has any understanding of the history of legislation affecting this question in the past would for a moment consent to its being sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. President, I do not know that it is worth while for me to take any more of the time of the Senate, but I do trust that when the vote is taken upon this question we are not going to violate all of the precedents of this body and take a bill that deals directly with the public lands of this country from the Public Lands Committee and send it to the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. SWANSON and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia. Before the Senator from Virginia begins, the Chair is going to rule on this very important subject that two speeches of five minutes each are all that will be allowed to each Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I believe that this is a matter which is within the jurisdiction of the Public Lands Committee, as has been uniformly the rule, as I understand; and, consequently, it ought to be referred to that committee.

I want to call attention to the fact that we have various reserves. The truth of the matter is that we have almost killed development of the West by reservations, beginning about 25 years ago. We have had coal reservations, petroleum reservations, and forest reservations; but nobody has ever thought that you had to refer a bill to the particular committee that may have to do with some policy of administration with relation to them, and deprive the Public Lands Committee of its jurisdiction.

Mr. President, those precedents have been numerous. Instead of being confined to one, there have been any number of instances of the kind. Legislation affecting forest reserves is never sent to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but is sent to the Committee on Public Lands every time. Inasmuch as this bill provides explicitly for the exchange of lands in this naval reserve for public lands on the outside, it seems to me it is absurd to say that the Public Lands Committee has not jurisdiction.

But, Mr. President, this very question has been before the Public Lands Committee for a long while; hundreds of pages of testimony have been taken by it, and its members thought it was solved by the reporting of a bill providing for certain remedies and certain relief. You will remember that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] was urgent in insisting that that provision should remain in the bill which was passed here on last Monday. There the whole problem, it seemed to us, was treated fairly. When the time came for considering the bill the Senator from Virginia said that he would introduce a bill dealing with this particular subject. He did not say that he was going to have that bill referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. He was simply to draft it and introduce it. I have not examined the bill as to its merits and therefore express no view as to anything but the reference of the bill. It ought to go where all the precedents say that it should go, because it deals with the public lands and the exchange of lands, over which the Committee on Public Lands unquestionably has jurisdiction.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will suggest to my friend that if there is any committee of the Senate that knows about the public lands, the necessity for exchanges, and so on, I should think it would be that committee which has had jurisdiction and has had so much experience within the last two years with all these questions. I doubt whether the Naval Affairs Committee has any more idea about the proper disposition of these particular things than any other committee of this body.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will allow me, we have only five minutes, and I shall be glad if the Senator will pursue that thought in further remarks.

Mr. President, when we reserve coal lands and treat the matter with respect to mining coal, we do not refer the bills to the Committee on Mines and Mining. We had that very question tested in the Senate here about a year ago, when the question arose as to whether a certain bill that provided for the development of reserved coal lands should be referred to the Public Lands Committee or to the Committee on Mines and Mining. The result was that after the consideration of the matter and a very full discussion the Senate, by a large majority, held that the bill should not be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining. Although I was a member of that committee and was not at that time a member of the Committee on Public Lands, I advocated that it should be held in the committee to which all precedents had assigned it.

The Agricultural Committee does not take jurisdiction of matters relating to the forests when they touch the transfer of public domain at all. The Committee on Mines and Mining never attempts to interfere with bills involving mining on the public domain, nor has there been any suggestion of it except in that one instance, when the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] tried to have a bill referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining. Then the precedent was unquestioned that it should go to the Committee on Public Lands, and we have gotten a good bill out with relation to that matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if this were simply a question of carving out from the public domain certain land and setting it apart for naval purposes, unquestionably the bill would belong to the Committee on Public Lands. It may be that there are some features of the bill that could properly go to the Committee on Public Lands. It frequently happens that a bill contains features part of which might properly go to one committee and part to another. The main features of this bill are provisions that fix the manner in which the Secretary of the Navy is to handle this property. It has already been carved from the public domain. It has already been separated by executive orders and in pursuance of legislation from the public domain. It is set apart to be used for naval purposes.

This bill gives the Secretary of the Navy the power to use it. This bill provides matter that is entirely disconnected from the work of the Committee on Public Lands.

Section 1 provides:

> And thereupon it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to take possession of all properties so vested in the United States, to conserve, develop, use, and operate the same in his discretion, directly or by contract, lease, or otherwise, and to use, store, exchange, refine, sell, or otherwise dispose of the oil and gas products thereof for the benefit of the United States.

Certainly that is the work of the Navy, and the consideration of that proposition is the work of the Naval Affairs Committee.

The next section provides:

> That all moneys derived from the operations conducted under the preceding section shall constitute an operating fund which shall be used by the Secretary of the Navy for continued operations of the same character; that this fund shall be reimbursed from the proper appropriations on account of the oil and gas products from said properties used by the United States at actual cost; and that any sums not required for such purposes of operation shall be covered into the Treasury as general receipts.

Section 2 involves the work of the Navy. Section 3 involves the work of the Navy. Section 4 involves the work of the Navy and applies to public lands. It authorizes the Navy Department to exchange a portion of these lands set apart for the Navy for lands outside. It is true that the lands outside might properly be handled by the Committee on Public Lands, but the process of exchange may well devolve upon the Committee on Naval Affairs.

So, Mr. President, the bulk of this bill bears upon authority to the Secretary of the Navy to perform certain duties and carry out certain acts with which the bill charges him. It is not at all a case of taking from the public domain. That legislation went to the Committee on Public Lands, and went there properly; but that legislation having been passed, and the property having been carved out to be used for naval affairs, this bill undertakes to provide the way. It is introduced by the Senator from Virginia, the leading member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is to place responsibility upon the Navy Department. It is to give it the machinery to execute that responsibility. The Committee on Public Lands has nothing to do with a measure of this kind. It is not the work of the Committee on Public Lands. Granting that there are a few features of the bill which might go to it, the preponderating features of the bill are measures that belong to the Navy, and therefore the bill should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I do not think the Committee on Public Lands would have any right to object or should object. There is practically nothing in this bill that would fall within their province. There is a great deal in it that falls within the province of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Senator from Virginia introduced the bill and moves that it go to the Committee of which he is often the acting chairman and always a leading member. His motion for reference is justified by the nature of the bill. His wishes should be respected.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if there ever was an attempt in the Senate on the part of a committee to take jurisdiction of a matter to which it is not entitled, it is the effort of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to get possession of this bill.

This land is governmental land, but not public land. You have as much right to take jurisdiction of a navy yard and say what shall be done to use it, to condemn land for a navy yard, as you have to do this. There is a distinction between governmental land and public land. Public land is land that is open to the public for entry. Not an acre of this land is open to the public for entry—not an acre of it. The Committee on Public Lands got rid of its jurisdiction when it allowed this land to be set aside for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy.

What committee has jurisdiction of the sale of property belonging to the Navy? All that this bill does is to condemn private property in the naval reserve, set aside for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy, so that the Government can get possession of private property.

The only thing in this matter that this jurisdiction can possibly hang on would be the exchange of these naval reserve lands for some lands outside. That is true, but the Committee on Naval Affairs has equal jurisdiction and equal right to jurisdiction on that phase of it. But take the rest of the measure. There is $1,000,000 appropriated for development, to get machinery, to make disposition of it, to store the oil, and I should like to know when the Naval Committee has ever been deprived of the privilege of providing storage for oil in the Navy or the means of developing the oil supply.

If there ever was an effort made in the Senate to encroach upon the jurisdiction of another committee it is the effort that is made by the Senator from Utah. He can not distinguish between governmental land and public land. Does not the Senator know well that there is not an acre of this land under the law that is open to public entry now? Is not that true? There is not an acre of it open to public entry, and he knows it as well as I do. This land has been set aside by law for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy. It was so stated in the proclamation. Who is to determine the amount of money necessary for a storage plant where it can be refined for the Navy to be used for battleships? It is the Committee on Naval Affairs that ought to determine the policy marked out for the Navy, and not the Committee on Public Lands.

This subject was improperly brought in here, and it was taken out from the bill then pending because we insisted that the disposition of this land and its development should be determined by the Naval Committee. Nine-tenths—yes, ninety-nine one-hundredths—of the bill is under the Secretary of the Navy, directed by the Secretary of the Navy. Appropriations are made for navy yards. I have never known the Public Lands Committee to be an appropriation committee. Did it ever have jurisdiction of an appropriation bill? I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if it has jurisdiction of an appropriation bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; but the committee has jurisdiction of the public lands.

Mr. SWANSON. Is there an acre of public lands involved here that can be entered? What part can be entered? The Senator can not distinguish between public land and governmental land. Governmental land is owned by the Government, and public land is subject to entry by the public. Not an acre of this land is subject to entry by the public.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator say that in the case of forest reserves the Public Lands Committee has no jurisdiction?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know anything about the disposition of forest reserves.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And coal lands? The jurisdiction is in the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not see how the Public Lands Committee could take jurisdiction of a matter in which an appropriation is made. It is well established that this is for the benefit of the Navy. Is that entire policy simply to go to the Public Lands Committee? Has that ever been an appropriation committee? Under the precedents, the bill should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I have never known a bill that put aside a naval reserve on the public lands or that appropriated an amount for a navy yard and provided for condemnation proceedings that did not emanate from the Naval Committee. About one-third of this land is owned by private individuals. All we ask is the privilege of making an appropriation and providing for furnishing oil for the Navy.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia before he takes his seat if this oil supply is not for the exclusive use of the Navy?

Mr. SWANSON. It authorizes the land to be set aside for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy. It provides for sinking wells and for getting oil and storing it and taking care of it, and placing it where the Navy might need it, and keeping it in future for the Navy. It is one of the most important policies regarding the Navy that could be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has said does not change the history of this whole legislation. I do not think the Senator from Virginia knows that the Secretary of the Navy has been before the Public Lands Committee time and time again upon this very legislation. We have had volumes of testimony taken before that committee upon this one question. The Secretary of the Navy never refused to come before the committee because of its lack of jurisdiction of the question. There was never anything suggested before that committee that it should go to any committee other than the Public Lands Committee.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that there is no need to take the time of the Senate upon this question, but I——.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SMOOT. I have only five minutes, and I want to get through.

The Senator asks the question, Did the Public Lands Committee ever make an appropriation? The House of Representatives make the appropriations, but there have been bills reported from the Public Lands Committee calling for appropriations for particular items named in the legislation, just the same as the bill here provides that there shall be $1,000,000 appropriated—and untold millions appropriated—for paying for lands that are expected to be taken over by the Navy Department. There is no sum named. It is just a conditional sum, as may be found necessary. Nobody knows whether it will be $100,000,000, $300,000,000, $500,000,000, or $1,000,000,000. I hope the Congress of the United States will never enter upon this sort of legislation.

Mr. President, it is useless to think of getting very many Senators here at this time of the day, and I want the Senate to go on record on this bill when it is voted upon. I am quite sure that we can not get a record vote of the Senate to-day, and I ask that it be read once to-day and go over under Rule XIV, which provides that every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about that right. The bill will be read.

The bill to further provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States with respect to the production, use, and conservation of oil and gas in naval petroleum reserves, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROADS.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3385) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

CLERKS TO DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3079) fixing the salary of the clerks of the United States district courts; prescribing how and when they shall account for the fees collected; providing for the office expenses of such clerks, including salaries of deputy clerks and clerical assistants; and for the travel and subsistence expense of such clerks and their deputies when necessarily absent from their official residences, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

COST OF OFFICERS' UNIFORMS.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3433) requiring the Government to furnish uniforms to officers of the Army, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLY OF PRINT PAPER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, Senate joint resolution 101.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of print paper at a fair price and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is, on page 1, line 4, after the word "empowered," to insert certain words.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, this joint resolution authorizing the Government to take over the paper and pulp industry of the country, which is now under consideration by the Senate, is perhaps of the most importance to my State of any domestic measure that has come before this body in the past decade. A State where the paper industry represents one-sixth of the entire valuation of its people is naturally interested in legislation affecting it.

The census of 1914 shows that Maine had 17 mills manufacturing both pulp and paper, 13 producing pulp only, and 8 which made only paper, a total of 38 great industrial plants. They employed 10,033 workers, both men and women, in the mills alone. Many more than this number were indirectly furnished employment in the woods, getting out raw material, and in the transportation of the product. The annual wage paid to workers, exclusive of clerks and officials, was $7,000,000. These mills had a capitalization of over $80,000,000. The value of their annual output exceeded $40,000,000. They paid for materials over $22,000,000 and paid taxes of more than $400,000. These figures have greatly increased, except in the number of mills, in the past two years.

If the claims set forth by the proponents of this bill were true in fact; if, indeed, the publishers of this country and the reading public were to be largely benefited and no serious damage were to be imposed upon another industry of my State, I should be glad to give it my unqualified indorsement; but instead of aiding those who are supposed to receive such relief it will, I believe, work the opposite and in the near future impose hardships upon those who are supposed to be benefited. I do not alone share these beliefs, nor do I think that the publishers of my State feel that the proposition would prove of assistance to them. First of all, I want to say that I have not received any communication from any publisher in Maine asking me to give this bill my support. On the other hand, from almost every manufacturer of paper in the State, at least, I have received advice that this bill would prove detrimental to their interests.

It has been said that some of the great manufacturers have operated their mills and business in restraint of trade. Whether this be true I do not know, but I do know that under the law creating the Federal Trade Commission there is ample authority to bring to justice any corporation so acting. I have always felt that the authority given the Federal Trade Commission was ample in its scope to deal with all such cases. It has authority to subpœna witnesses, to oblige every business man to open his books and divulge not only to the Federal Trade Commission but to the court as well all details of his business and lay open to the world those matters which are of so much moment and consequence to the business man.

I do not share the oft-repeated assertion that every business man is an outlaw or that all those engaged in the great manufacturing and commercial interests of the country, who have become unusually successful by their efforts, are nefarious in their practices or unjust in their dealings, or the idea that these business men of tremendous capacity should be "hung as high as Haman"; but, on the other hand, it is time now that this Government lend aid instead of attempting to hamper and embarrass the industries of this country.

It is asserted by those who favor the passage of this bill that the paper manufacturers have been extortionate in their price and unfair in their dealings. I deny the charge. These men engaged in the paper industry in this country are honest and reputable business men. First, let me comment upon this alleged extortion in price; I wish to be very careful in any statements I may make, and to assure the Members of the Senate that I can amply prove every assertion which I make. The average price of news-print paper, up to and including the year 1913, for a considerable period was about $2.15 per hundredweight, delivered at destination, and on that basis the great paper mills of the country were able to pay only 2 per cent annually on the preferred stock, which had back of it at least double its worth in sound value of invested capital. These prices prevailing in 1913 drove several mills into bankruptcy and the industry in this country was in a deplorable condition.

The movement across the border into Canada was begun at that time and has continued ever since. The average price of news-print paper in 1917 was $3.10 a hundredweight, at the mill, an increase of about 50 per cent. This advance, I submit, was less than that of almost any commodity produced in our country. I believe, considering the increased demand for paper, the high cost of labor and of everything entering into the manufacture, which have been advancing by leaps and bounds, as I have stated, this advance is not unreasonable. As compared to the advance of other articles it makes a most favorable showing, as shown by the following: Advance of paper, 50 per cent; cotton, 250 per cent; wool, 300 per cent, and if other commodities were to be considered I could go through the entire list and show greater advance in these than have existed at any time in the advance of paper; for instance, the price of corn, one of the chief products in my own State, has advanced in the past few years 266⅔ per cent. These figures demonstrate the fallacy of the charge made against paper.

By what token does the Federal Trade Commission—for I understand that from this source comes the demand for this legislation—select this industry and propose Government control for the paper business? From what business sources come the demand for this legislation? As I have stated, not a single publisher from my State, knowing full well the condition of the paper business, has asked for the enactment of this resolution.

It is natural that every business should desire to purchase its supplies at the lowest possible price. If every purchaser of goods and every association desirous of buying at a low price should come to this Congress with resolution for relief and receive assistance, every business man and every association in the country would go into the resolving business. It is also asserted that the manufacturers of paper have attempted to limit the output. So has every far-seeing citizen of this country undertaken to limit this production.

Spruce wood from which print paper is largely manufactured comes to maturity about once in 30 years. There are about 60,000,000,000 feet growing in the United States suitable for the manufacture of paper; one-third of this is growing on the soil of Maine. We can cut from now to the end of time 750,000,000 feet annually and still have our forests in prime condition, but should we extend this cut to 1,000,000,000 or one and a half billion in a very few years the forests would be depleted and there would be no source of supply. Naturally those who have large investments in paper mills are desirous of continuing the business, because when the source of supply ceases the mills become valueless and useless; for this reason the manufacturers of paper are endeavoring to conserve the supply of spruce, which clears them of the charge of wrongfully limiting the production. If you desire to aid the publishers of this country repeal the zone system enacted last session, which will in my judgment be of greater benefit to them than any possible control by the Government of the paper industry.

The paper manufacturers of our country, realizing fully the tremendous draft upon our forests, a number of years ago commenced the purchase of timber lands in Canada. The Canadians were anxious to sell these lands, which they did, at liberal prices.

Our manufacturers purchased on a generous scale, and, I may say, millions of acres were bought, believing they could ship this pulp wood to the States for manufacture. Almost immediately the Canadians passed a law placing an embargo on pulp wood and many of the mills in the country went into the hands of receivers. Many of our large and most successful manufacturers were obliged to build in Canada mills which are operating to-day. And, Senators, at this moment, instead of undertaking to pass this measure and further embarrass the paper manufacturers of this country, we should be endeavoring to remove the restrictions of the Canadian Government. We should insist that unless they remove the embargo which they have placed on pulp wood not a pound of coal or cotton from the United States be permitted to enter their border; that in order to receive our products they should be made to reciprocate.

In reply to a question propounded to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Arizona, asking if there had been any considerable advance in labor and in the production of paper he replied that the cost had slightly advanced. I do not know how he interprets that word "slightly." I have here a telegram from Frank D. True, treasurer and manager of the Poland Paper Co., which answers this completely, and which I want to read into the RECORD at this time. Mr. True is one of the most successful business men in Maine, whose word is accepted by every man in the State, and, further, he is an out-and-out Jeffersonian, Jacksonian Democrat, which ought to be sufficient guarantee of his integrity to my friends on the other side of the Chamber. Mr. True's wire reads as follows:

An advance of more than 100 per cent.

Here I wish to say in passing that Mr. True, who is treasurer of the Poland Paper Co., an industry established in my town, for years gave his services without compensation, in an effort to keep the plant running and build up the business of the town. Perhaps a few words as to the history of this plant—and this is not an isolated case—are not out of place. It was established more than 60 years ago, and is located on one of the fine water powers of our State, and around it has grown up a thriving village. This plant to-day is operating at only 25 per cent of its capacity for the reason that it is unable to procure pulp, and the town is languishing on this account. If this company were able to secure pulp from Canada, as formerly planned, the plant would be running at its full capacity.

I cite this case because I am familiar with conditions, but this same situation exists in other localities. Many other large towns in our State, which have been built up by this industry are equally affected, and the enactment of such legislation would seriously affect further development, and possibly curtail even present production. Permit me to call attention to the town of Rumford, containing several large mills, which for years supplied the United States Government with its postal cards. Here is a town dependent entirely upon this industry. This town has grown up in the wilderness around the paper industry.

Millinocket and East Millinocket, in another section of the State, which have been built up and become thriving and prosperous towns depend entirely upon this one industry. I might cite numerous other instances of this kind, but these are sufficient to show that this question is of vital importance to the people of my State; and I can not see how the legislation here proposed would help in any way to increase the output, but would embarrass and discourage these industries.

It is needless for me to stand here and say to the Members of the Senate that the advance in labor has been something phenomenal and that there is no industry, however small or great, but that feels the result. Every Senator knows this to be true. Only recently there appeared before the Commerce Committee a man representing the largest private shipbuilding corporation in the United States. He testified that laborers with but little experience in his shipyard were receiving from $6 to $10 a day and some as high as $90 a week. I asked him where he drew these men from, and he replied, "As many as possible from the farms near my plant." In Maine to-day it is difficult to secure men to labor in the woods, and spruce timber, which is largely in demand for other purposes besides paper making, has advanced nearly 300 per cent in price. This answers the question as to whether there has been a considerable increase in the cost of producing paper.

A Senator yesterday told me that he was obliged to pay $20 a cord for wood in this city. Let me say to you, Mr. President, that the great manufacturers of paper are to-day moving pulp and wood from Maine to Pennsylvania, at an expense of $18 per cord, to manufacture paper with which to supply their customers.

Ah, Senators, it is time that this Congress do something toward the aid of business men and business interests; it is time for us to go into the repealing business and repeal some of the laws that are already on the statute books. The fear of what is coming, basing their knowledge on the acts which have already passed, is casting a gloom over business men and causing them seriously to consider retrenchments as precautionary measures.

The legislatures of 48 States, aside from this Congress, have been laboriously and industriously enacting laws of every conceivable character until it would seem that we were law mad. This legislation causes confusion, and every business of any considerable size is obliged to retain an attorney to guide and keep it within the law. To a liberty loving people who are desirous of square dealing and honorable methods this proceeding is unnecessary and obnoxious. More than this, it involves an expense which ultimately the consumer pays.

This measure has been brought into the Senate under the guise of helping the Executive to carry on the war, but this is absolutely no war measure. It is not necessary for this Government to go further in this direction; there is no man in this Senate, no man in this country, who is more desirous of bringing this war to a successful conclusion than I. I am willing to go to any limit to enact such laws as will assist the President in this consummation. I believe it is the duty of every citizen not only to do his bit but to do his best in this great crisis. Successfully to prosecute this war we must have men and money. Now and then a Senator declares that there must be no profiteering. If by this term is meant unfair, unjust, excessive, illegal, and exorbitant profit making, I certainly agree. But, Senators, we must allow business a fair, reasonable, and just return upon its investment. Where, Senators, is the money coming from to carry on this war unless business men are allowed to conduct their business in a reasonable and profitable way? If no man were allowed to make profit in his business, he would have nothing from which to pay taxes and no interest in the prosecution of his business. We must soon ask the country to subscribe to another bond issue. We can compel men to pay taxes, but we can not compel them to buy bonds; and I fear that unless we turn about, lend our efforts to the assistance of the business of our country, we shall not receive the response to this call which we all so much desire.

I am not naturally of a pessimistic nature. I prefer to look hopefully forward to the days succeeding this terrible war with the belief that the liberties of our people will be preserved. This Government of ours, established by the fathers, shall endure. This is no time for partisanship or sectionalism. Senators from one section of the country must not, and will not, impose hardships and injustice upon others, but we must stand together, and, as Webster said more than 70 years ago, "clasp hands" and unitedly fight this great war.

I am aware that as a national question there is another side to this issue which has already been covered by many Senators in this Chamber. Two bills before this joint resolution have been introduced into the Senate providing for the censorship of the press. The first was defeated by one vote and the second by a reasonable majority; but this joint resolution, which I consider the most vicious of them all, ought to be defeated by an overwhelming majority.

I am aware that Carlyle in some of his gloomy papers has pictured this Republic in the year 2,000 as a thing of the past. I am aware that he has predicted that the free institutions which we have so firmly and successfully established will, before the end of the present century molder, decay, and have perished, and that he has attempted to demonstrate the impossibility of free government; but I have lived long enough, Senators, to see many such dire predictions as this come to naught. Yet I fear and warn you now that unless some encouragement be given to those engaged in the business interests of this country and to all who are trying to do their part that the words of Carlyle's prophecy will become a grim and terrible reality.

Let us stand firmly together not as members of separate parties but as American citizens, devoted to those principles which have been cherished from the conception of our Republic, and we shall bequeath to our children and our children's children the greatest Government and the grandest Republic that the world has ever known.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask the Secretary to report the first amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	James	New	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Sutherland
Colt	Kellogg	Pittman	Swanson
Culberson	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thomas
Cummins	King	Pomerene	Tillman
Fernald	Kirby	Ransdell	Trammell
Fletcher	Knox	Robinson	Underwood
France	La Follette	Saulsbury	Watson
Gerry	McCumber	Shafroth	Williams
Hale	McKellar	Sheppard	Wolcott
Harding	McNary	Sherman
Hardwick	Martin	Shields

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I desire to state that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] has been called from the Chamber on important business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Secretary will report the first amendment submitted by the Senator from Arizona.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, after the first word, "That," strike out the words "the Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and empowered," and in lieu insert "whenever, during the continuance of the war and for six months thereafter, the President shall deem it needful, he may direct the Federal Trade Commission."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the joint resolution what is the necessity of this amendment? Is not the joint resolution complete without it? Why is it that we are designating the President as the person who shall say?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator from Nebraska will readily admit that all legislation is a compromise. The joint resolution without this amendment would read:

That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and empowered to supervise, control, and regulate the production and the distribution of print paper—

And so forth.

Instead of that, I have offered the amendment, so that it would read:

That whenever during the continuance of the war—

I do not care if the language "and for six months thereafter" be rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not my only objection to the amendment, I will say to the Senator. Not only that amendment, but further down, in lines 9 and 10, there is an amendment which reads, "as the President shall designate," following out, of course, the same idea, turning it all over to the President. If these amendments were all agreed to, it would be within the power of the President, I take it, to designate any particular mills and producing agencies which shall be operated on Government account, and so forth, and how the product shall be distributed; he might designate that Mr. A, in one town, might get his paper, and that Mr. B should not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator from Nebraska very well knows that the President of the United States, with his multifarious and onerous duties, could not go and look into this business, and this is a safeguard.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a good reason why this amendment should not be adopted. The President must follow somebody else's advice, and it will probably be that of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. He might not follow their advice.

Mr. NORRIS. The President will not be able to give the matter his attention personally. As the Senator from Arizona has said, he has so many duties to perform that he could not possibly give attention to all of them, and this would probably be one to which he could not give attention. To my mind, that is the objection to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Would the Senator from Nebraska prefer the language of the original joint resolution? If a majority of the Senate prefer that, I am perfectly willing to ask that it be adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. So far as I am concerned, I am going to vote against this amendment and against several others, entirely on the ground that I prefer the joint resolution as it was originally introduced by the Senator from Arizona. I have never, during the debate when I have been present, heard any argument made in reference to these particular amendments. That is the reason why I was asking the question. It seems to me this amendment weakens the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Unquestionably, from the standpoint of the Senator from Nebraska, it weakens the joint resolution. To be perfectly frank I have made concessions in order to get some sort of relief for these papers. I have been forced to make these concessions. These concessions, everybody here consents, liberalizes the joint resolution, putting the least possible control over the business, and yet the question is whether or not Senators will vote for the resolution even then.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that the Senator from Arizona is catering to Senators who will vote against the joint resolution any way and making it distasteful to those who would like to support it. To my mind this amendment is not liberalizing the joint resolution, but making it more stringent than it previously was.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Let us see what the language is and leave the matter to the Senate. It reads, as originally reported:

The Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and empowered to supervise, control, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States, and that all mills producing and all agencies distributing print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States shall——

Mr. NORRIS. "Shall be operated."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Wait.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is speaking in my time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I beg pardon of the Senator. The Senator had resumed his seat. I thought I was answering him in my own time. The language is "mechanical and chemical pulp," and so forth. Now, let us see. That language gave the Federal Trade Commission absolute authority to supervise, control, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper. I have provided in the amendment:

That whenever during the continuance of the war * * * the President shall deem it needful he may direct the Federal Trade Commission to supervise and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp.

The reason we inserted that language was that, instead of conferring all this power on the Trade Commission, if the Trade Commission should say, "We do not want to do all this; there are many papers that are not offensive," they then can present to the President only the offensive ones; and the President could then make the order. So, you see, it is only permitting the Federal Trade Commission to act through the agency of an appeal to the President, who will necessarily do what they say. It gives him an opportunity of escape from supervision where none at all is necessary. That is the reason for the amendment, and that is my purpose. I should like a vote on the amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment; and I think I can state to the Senate in a very few words why I am opposed to it.

If this legislation is necessary at all, then Congress ought to enact it on its own responsibility and by the exercise of its own power. We have no business to shift to the President a responsibility that belongs to us. Instead of enacting a law which its proponents must claim is necessary, or at least advisable, if the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is adopted, the Congress will simply say, "We enact this law if the President thinks best to put it into effect in whole or in part, and we put the responsibility on him."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is equally true against the Federal Trade Commission, is it not?

Mr. HARDWICK. It may be; but I am opposed to all that sort of business. Let this Congress shoulder its own responsibility.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But Congress could not investigate the matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then we ought not to pass such legislation if we can not investigate. If we do not know it is needed, if we can not affirmatively sustain the burden that the legislation is necessary and advisable, then there ought to be no legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly not.

Mr. HARDWICK. On the other hand, if we are convinced that the burden can be carried, that there ought to be such legislation, then we ought not to shift the burden of responsibility which rests on us and say, "We will have legislation only in the event the President thinks it is needed." I am not in favor of this sort of an amendment, and I hope the Senate will vote the amendment down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question] The "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. HARDWICK and Mr. HARDING called for a division; and the question being put on a division, the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment.

The next committee amendment was, on page 2, line 2, after the words "mechanical and chemical pulp,' to insert the words "and their products."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, as the first amendment has been stricken out, I am reduced to going back to the original joint resolution, and I should prefer to withdraw every amendment I have offered to it in the present attitude of the Senate, for there is no use of attempting to perfect the joint resolution with its present amendments, if the first amendment endeavoring to cure the very language against which every complaint has been made was voted down, unless it be the desire of those who voted in that way to defeat the joint resolution entirely.

My object was to prevent the very thing against which all Senators have been inveighing, and if the amendment I have offered for that purpose be stricken out, the remainder of the joint resolution should be so framed as to correspond with it.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Arizona refer to the amendment now pending?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That was the only amendment pending.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Arizona have reference to the words in line 6, page 2—"and their products"?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The difficulty under which I am laboring is that I have a copy of the joint resolution which I myself have been marking and have not the one which the Senator from Nebraska has in his hand. Does the Senator refer to the words "and their products" on page 2, line 6?

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, to insert those words is the pending amendment. I may be mistaken, but in the copy which I have in my hand that is the next amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary state the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the joint resolution as originally printed, in line 2, after the words "mechanical and chemical pulp," the committee proposes to insert the words "and their products."

Mr. FLETCHER. That amendment ought to go in, of course. That has nothing to do with the other amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me this amendment, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, has nothing to do with the one which has just been voted down. Personally I see no reason why this amendment should not be adopted, although I voted against the other amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection to its adoption after the amendment that I offered has been defeated, my purpose being to limit the joint resolution in its scope, so as not to interfere with that magnificent business of which I have heard so much, which formed a combination to rob somebody. When that is gone further amendment is of no use. I do not care whether the words "and their products" remain in or not. That is the attitude in which we are left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, before the word "mills," it is proposed to strike out the word "all" and insert in lieu the word "such."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I withdraw that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. The next committee amendment is on page 2, line 3, before the word "agencies," to strike out the word "all" and insert the word "such."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will withdraw that amendment. In view of the action the Senate has now taken, it hardly carries out the purpose intended when proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendment is withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, after the words "mechanical and chemical pulp," it is proposed to insert the words "and their products."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that amendment is not agreed to, a similar amendment having been rejected. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, after the words "the United States," it is proposed to insert the words "as the President shall designate."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I withdraw that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 18, after the word "paper," it is proposed to insert the words "pulp and pulp products."

Mr. SMOOT. That ought to go out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, beginning in line 4, it is proposed to strike out all of section 3 and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the President, during the present war emergency, shall have power by proclamation to declare that such imports of mechanical and chemical pulp and their products as he shall deem necessary in order to fully effectuate the objects of this act, shall be made only on account of the United States of America, to or through the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Secretary will state.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In the reprint of the bill, after the words "in order to fully effectuate the object of this act," I move to insert the words "shall be sold and distributed under the supervision of the Federal Trade Commission as provided for in section 1 of this act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to ask the Senator from Arizona a question about this provision which I think would apply to the original part stricken out as well as to the amendment. Would this provision affect existing contracts that are now in force with reference to the purchase of print paper; for instance, by a newspaper in this country from a paper producer in Canada?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not think Congress could enact legislation affecting an existing legal contract.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me the language is broad enough to do so. If we give the President the power to do it, it seems to me he can do it; and if the Senator does not want it to have that effect, I should like to see an amendment something like this put in: I will merely suggest it to see whether the Senator would oppose it. At the conclusion say "except that existing contracts shall not be interfered with."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection to preserving any existing contracts, and I would be glad to accept the amendment. I confess that I am put somewhat at sea because of the changes in the joint resolution from what I had hoped might be made. I had hoped that we might be able to preserve some sort of unity, and I have been working on the theory that the Senate would prefer a measure with less rather than one with more restrictions. I now find, however, that the amendment to section 3 inserting the words "as provided for in section 1 of this act," section 1 of the act not having been amended in any way, does not seem to apply.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, it seems to me that the amendment he offers now is entirely in harmony with the situation in which section 1 is left.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. As it now stands?

Mr. FLETCHER. As it now stands. The amendment, as I gather, is to strike out in line 22 of the reprint, after the word "be," the words "made only on account of the United States of America to or through the Federal Trade Commission" and insert "sold and distributed under the supervision and regulation of the Federal Trade Commission." In other words, it is proposed to leave the whole matter with the Federal Trade Commission, as the joint resolution now stands, in view of the rejection of the amendment to section 1. This provision continues the power in the Federal Trade Commission, and, instead of the words "made only on account of the United States," it is proposed, I understand, that the product shall be sold and distributed under the regulations of the Federal Trade Commission, which harmonizes with the way in which section 1 now is, and it seems to me very much improves the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. On account of the difference of the two prints of the bill and the difficulty of following the amendments as stated, I am somewhat confused; but the Senator's explanation is perfectly clear and section 3 should be amended as indicated in the reprint and by the addition of the words which I have read; that is, commencing in line 11 strike out all down to and including the word "act" in line 17, and then insert the new matter beginning after the word "act," in line 17, perfecting it as I have indicated, so that it will read:

That the President, during the present war emergency, shall have power by proclamation to declare that such imports of mechanical and chemical pulp and their products as he shall deem necessary in order to fully effectuate the objects of this act, shall be sold and distributed under the supervision and regulation of the Federal Trade Commission as provided for in section 1 of this act.

That makes it conform thoroughly to the other provisions of the joint resolution. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I am unable to see any essential difference——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator not allow us to perfect this amendment?

Mr. HARDING. I do not object to perfecting the amendment, but I do want to say something about the section itself. I have not any particular choice myself between the words proposed to be eliminated and the substitute proposed by the chairman of the committee. I think any Senator can understand that the fundamental cure for high prices of print paper is increased production. While I think this Government is a very powerful one, I am unable to understand how it can control the production of a neighboring people. I have in mind this sort of a problem: Owing to the growing scarcity of news-print paper in this country and the vital necessity of a supply to a great newspaper, many of them who are able to command the financial means necessary to do so have established their own paper mills. I do not know how far-reaching this joint resolution is intended to be, but it seems to me it would be a very great violation of individual rights for the Government to step in and take from an individual owner, himself producing a supply of paper, and distribute it at the whim of the Federal Trade Commission. It would certainly be very unjust to place in the hands of any authority in this country the power to prohibit the imports of either spruce wood or sulphite pulp. It looks to me as though we were getting deeper and deeper all the time in our efforts to perfect this joint resolution.

What the newspapers of this country need more than anything else, aside from the voluntary arrangement for a fair price for print paper, which has been in effect since the 1st of January, are the things essential to increased production. Every one familiar with the paper trade knows that a very large percentage of the raw material for paper making must be imported. It comes from Canada, and we are proposing here to hamper and hinder production by putting an embargo, at the instance of the President, on the importation of pulp and wood and sulphite from Canada. Everything that we are proposing to do is calculated to hinder the production of the essential supplies to relieve the news-print situation in these United States.

I think the whole joint resolution ought to fail. Instead of doing something to help the newspapers of this country, we are doing something to add to the tax already imposed upon the newspaper publishers of the land. I am very well aware that many newspapers are telegraphing here in favor of the passage of this joint resolution, but I am just as well aware that they have not stopped to realize the far-reaching results which may attend the act of the United States Government going into the manufacture and control of paper. If we only judge by our experience in dealing with coal, which I took occasion the other day to admit seemed to be a necessity, we would be warned that, instead of helping a difficult situation, we are going to embarrass it for every publisher in this country. The joint resolution ought to fail, and this amendment and the section for which it is proposed as a substitute ought not to have the sanction of this body.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I had not intended to address the Senate upon this joint resolution, although I am opposed to it, and would not have done so but for the remarks made this morning by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. When I say "the remarks made by the Senator from Utah" I do not refer to his observations upon the position I have taken upon the constitutionality of the program of war legislation we have passed. I was impelled and intended to rise to say to him that in expressing the hope that some one would correctly appraise the present situation of this country, and particularly in the Democratic Party, that I doubt if any man, however distinguished or however broad his statesmanship, could have made a more powerful appeal for a recrudescence of the principles upon which this Government is founded than has the Senator from Utah. I think, however, Mr. President, that in justice to myself I ought to take some cognizance of his observation as to the position that I have taken upon the constitutionality of the program of legislation to which I have referred.

It is my own misfortune, and due to my own limitations, if I failed to make it perfectly clear that I was not one of those who for one instant imagined that any part of the Constitution of the United States was suspended during a period of war. Why, Mr. President, upon the contrary, there is never a period of time when the Constitution of the United States is so vital and so much in action as during war, because then all of its powers are called into play. We might just as well say that the Constitution of the United States is suspended or dead because of war, as to say that a man who rises in defense of his family against an intruder has had his normal functions suspended, as upon the contrary, his latent powers and natural passions are aroused when he flies to the defense of that which he holds most dear.

The Constitution of the United States specifically empowers the Congress of the United States to declare war. It not only empowers the Congress of the United States to declare war but it prohibits such power to the States, and, in addition to that, the Constitution in terms empowers the Congress to enact all laws necessary to carry that power—the power of war—into effect; so that, Mr. President, my position has all along been that there is nothing in the Constitution that in any way limits or interferes with the power of self-preservation. There is no principle in the Constitution so sacred that this Government must perish in order to preserve it; upon the contrary, when we are at war Congress can pass any law necessary to carry the war to a victorious conclusion.

Mr. President, the question of necessity is the question that Congress must consider. This question of necessity imposes upon us an obligation from which we can not escape. It is for the administration, it is for the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy, it is for the Chief Executive of the United States to propose to us the powers that he desires in order to prosecute the war; but it is for us to judge of the necessity of those powers. Upon us rests the duty, upon us rests the responsibility, upon us rests the obligation; so that the acid test for every bill that is laid before this body, so far as we are concerned, is: Satisfy us as to the necessity.

Mr. President, when a measure was rejected in the Senate last spring proposing to create a censorship of the American press I opposed the measure, not upon the ground that there were no circumstances under which the Congress of the United States might constitutionally pass a censorship bill, but upon the ground that no necessity had been shown at that time to lay the powerful control of censorship upon the American press. For myself I realized that while we had vested unparalleled powers in the Chief Executive, while we had appropriated unthought-of sums of money for the expenditures of this war, if there ever was a time when we ought to weigh and weigh conscientiously and weigh deliberately the question of necessity of proposed legislation it was under such circumstances. I believe if ever there was a time when the press of America should be free, when the press should be in a position where it could speak without coercion, it was when these vast powers were being exercised and these stupendous sums of money were being expended.

Mr. President, it is not enough, it is never enough, that some one in executive authority desires a measure to be passed. It is never enough that the argument shall be closed when we are told that the administration desires the enactment of a bill unless we propose to play the ignoble part of which the poet spoke in referring to the Roman Senate:

A Cæsar with a Senate at his heels.

Mr. President, to me this measure is incomprehensible. It is unscientific in construction, and if its purpose is to be judged by its possibilities it is vicious in purpose. The one great reason recited in the preamble of the resolution, the one reason that is tangible, is that proper news shall be generally and efficiently distributed. It is true that the preamble recites the necessity of supplying the Government with print paper, which in itself is in principle a trifling necessity; but for the purpose that is most specifically avowed is that the proper news shall be efficiently disseminated.

Mr. President, I ask now, as I asked last spring, what necessity is there for us to exercise this unprecedented power over the newspapers of the country upon the theory that improper news is now being distributed? If any institution in this country has shown greater loyalty, greater consideration, and more self-sacrifice than the press of America in dealing with war news, I know not what it is; and it is rather significant that as the newspapers themselves begin more thoroughly to understand the vicious principle within this bill the more they are disposed to ask us to withhold such an extraordinary grant of power.

As I have stated at another time, I received this morning from the Philadelphia newspapers the following telegram, illustrating the awakened attitude toward this measure:

The Philadelphia newspaper publishers are unanimously opposed to governmental control of the newspaper industry.

This is signed by the Philadelphia Bulletin, the Philadelphia North American, the Philadelphia Public Ledger, the Philadelphia Press, the Philadelphia Record, the Philadelphia Inquirer, the Philadelphia Evening Ledger, and the Philadelphia Telegraph. These papers, as Senators know, represent every shade and phase of political thought in the State of Pennsylvania and in the United States—Republicans, Democrats, and Progressives alike.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be modified as read by me, in which case I have no objection to the insertion of the Senator's amendment with regard to not affecting the validity of any present existing contract. Of course, we have no desire to do that, and I have no objection to that amendment. My words are only to make it consonant with the balance of the bill. Then let the vote come on the amendment as amended by the words I have stated.

I ask the Secretary to report the amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that that modification be made in it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator has a right, has he not, to modify his proposition in any way he wants to? He can modify it himself.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know, but I want these words inserted in the amendment as read by the Secretary. The amendment is in italics in the reprint of the bill, and to those words I have asked to add that it shall be sold and distributed under the supervision and regulation provided in section 1 of the bill. I modify my amendment to that extent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was going to suggest that the Senator make that provision also a part of his modification.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection to that coming in as a modification to my amendment, that it shall not affect any existing contract, if the Secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Arizona proposes to amend the committee amendment as follows:

In the part proposed to be inserted, section 3, strike out the words "made only on account of the United States of America to or through the Federal Trade Commission," and in lieu thereof insert——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Strike out down to "to or through"; leave in "the Federal Trade Commission."

The SECRETARY. Strike out the words "made only on account of the United States of America to or through the Federal Trade Commission," and insert——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; leave in "the Federal Trade Commission."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as he understands it.

The SECRETARY. And insert the following words:

sold and distributed under the supervision and regulation of the Federal Trade Commission as provided for in section 1 of this act, except that existing contracts shall not be interfered with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is that right now?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment as amended. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I call for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of the amendment as amended will rise. [A pause.] Those opposed will rise. [A pause.] The impression of the Chair was right. The amendment is rejected. The joint resolution is in the Committee of the Whole——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have not heard the decision of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. On that I wanted the yeas and nays. I demand the yeas and nays. I did not hear the announcement of the Chair. I was waiting and listening to hear the announcement of the result.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona called for a division of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And he got it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And it was against the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled. The amendment is rejected. The Senator can offer the amendment again in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I give notice that I shall call for the yeas and nays on the amendment in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can do that in the Senate, but not now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, is the text of the bill now subject to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to perfect it by adding, after the word "act," in line 17, the proviso which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, section 3, after the word "act," on line 10, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That this act shall not affect any valid contracts existing and in force at the time of its approval.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I reserve the right to offer that amendment in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if I can get the attention of the Senate for a minute, I think I understand the purpose of the opposition here. If you do not like a thing, no matter how good it happens to be or how nearly good it may be, so that some sort of amendment might help it, the best way to beat it is to make it as obnoxious as possible; and I see Senators here actually vote for an amendment to violate a contract. Then, I suppose, they will refuse to vote for the joint resolution. In this connection I do not know exactly where we are all standing, but I will leave that for some subsequent remarks that I will submit.

I move to amend the joint resolution on line 4, page 1, of the original print, where it reads:

That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and empowered to supervise, control, and regulate the production—

I move to strike out the word "control."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the word "control" and the comma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the significance of the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If it makes no difference, it does not hurt to have it go out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is scarcely an explanation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If it makes a difference, it might hurt to keep it in. If it makes the bill still more unpopular to keep it in, I can understand the opposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the purpose of my inquiry is to have the Senator from Arizona tell the Senate what his amendment will do in the actual operation of this law.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Trade Commission is authorized and empowered to supervise and regulate. Will the Senator himself tell me why he has any objection to leaving out the word "control" if he can not see any distinction?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New York is not the sponsor of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No. If he were, it would be differently written.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The sponsor of the bill rises upon the floor of the Senate and moves to strike out one of these words.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And I have asked the Senator why he does so.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do so because I do not want them to control. Is that sufficient?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator think that they will not control if we take out the word "control"?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not want the word "control" in, because the word "control" gives them the power to control without any question as to how it may be subsequently decided.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What does the word "regulate" imply?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is another matter. The word "regulate" is in there, and I want the word "regulate," because we all know what it means.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is one Senator who does not know and never has known what "regulation" meant.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That may be true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, that shows the difficulties under which a man labors who is almost down now with pneumonia, who can hardly hear a word spoken in this body. The decision on the former amendment was held against me. I did not hear a word of it. It was impossible for me to hear it. The eustachian tube is absolutely closed, and it has been observed that I have to walk over to-day to listen to anything that is said. So, if the amendment is agreed to, I am obliged to the tender consideration of the Senate and certainly will make no motion about it when we get into the Senate itself.

In conformity with that, in the case of the second amendment, on page 2, I desire to strike out after the words "chemical pulp in the United States shall," on line 4, the words "be operated on Government account; that these products be pooled in the hands of the Federal Trade Commission for the term of the war and the emergency occasioned thereby and equitably distributed."

I ask to strike out those words and insert "equitably distribute such products at a price based upon cost of production," and so forth. In other words, I am letting these products be equitably distributed without this seizure or pooling.

I ask that that amendment be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will ask the Senator from Arizona to see if the Secretary has it right.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, beginning on line 4, after the word "shall," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the words "equitably distributed," on line 8, and to insert "equitably distribute such products," so that it will read:

And that all mills producing and all agencies distributing print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States shall equitably distribute such products at a price based upon cost of production and distribution plus a fair profit per ton, as determined by the Federal Trade Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Secretary have it right?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand the Secretary to have it right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, some amendments were proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who is not here, to which I have no objection as far as I am personally concerned. In the case of the amount to be retained by the Government, instead of being 25 per cent, it was proposed to make it 10 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President in the reprint of the bill it is on page 2, line 19.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 13, strike out "75" and insert "90."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. And before the words "per cent," on line 17 of the same page, strike out "75" and insert "90."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. And in the provision as to a fine, on page 3, line 24, it is proposed to strike out "$50,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, in the interest of the conservation of print paper and of our eyesight, I propose an additional section which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, a new section, as follows:

SEC. 5. That from and after 30 days from the approval of this act no newspaper shall be issued containing more than 16 pages such as were ordinarily printed by such paper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I call for a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I shall ask for a separate vote on that amendment in the Senate, and shall call for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, is that debatable?

Mr. HARDING. A point of order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARDING. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, can anything be done with the pending measure except to bring it to a final vote?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I remember, the present occupant of the Chair ruled that to recommit a bill to a committee under unanimous-consent agreement was a final disposition of the bill as far as the Senate was concerned. That is what the unanimous-consent agreement provides for—the final disposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Can the Senator refer the Chair to that ruling?

Mr. FLETCHER. The present occupant of the Chair held just the contrary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I thought I ruled the other way.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not the ruling before me. I know I always was of the opinion, and am now, that under a unanimous-consent agreement providing for final disposition a bill could not be recommitted to a committee; but, as I remember, a ruling was made contrary to what I had formerly thought was the practice of this body. I may be mistaken, however, but I think we had better have a ruling on the question to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair may be mistaken about it; that would be quite natural; but the present recollection of the Chair is that he ruled that it could not be recommitted to the committee; that that was not a final disposition at all, but the measure would simply go back to the committee and again be reported to the Senate, and that such a course was a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement. That is the Chair's recollection of the ruling he made, although he may be mistaken, and it might be well to take a moment to look into it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not particular whether we vote upon the resolution directly or whether we vote upon a recommittal of it. As far as my personal opinion is concerned, I think the proper thing to do is to vote directly upon the joint resolution and not to have a vote on a motion to recommit it, although I had understood the ruling of the Chair to be otherwise.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator has momentarily overlooked the fact that just prior to our adjournment on Friday the Senator having charge of the bill asked the floor leader, who had moved to adjourn until Monday, whether such action would interfere with a final vote upon the joint resolution, whether it would be sidetracked; and he was assured to the contrary not only by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] but also by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is wrong in that. The Senator then had reference to taking up another bill and displacing his resolution as the unfinished business.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if the Chair will look on page 264 of the Precedents, he will find the ruling to which reference has been made.

Mr. THOMAS. I think I am correct about that, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. What I stated to the Senator from Arizona was that I would vote against taking up any other bill to displace the unfinished business.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, from the very language of the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate is precluded from recommitting this resolution. I am opposed to recommitting this resolution, and unless you break the unanimous-consent agreement a motion to recommit can not be entertained, because it provides that the resolution shall proceed "through the regular parliamentary stages to its 'final disposition,'" and every one of us who indulges in the luxury of reflection knows that to "recommit" a bill is not proceeding to its final disposition. It means that there will or may be more proceedings taken later thereon. Should such a motion prevail it would not be a "final disposition"; to recommit would mean that the Senate through one of its committees would still retain jurisdiction over the resolution, and such could not be a "final disposition."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair finds, through the courtesy of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], that substantially the same question was ruled upon by the Chair on the 17th of October, 1914, where, under a unanimous-consent agreement, I ruled that a motion to lay the bill on the table was not in order, not being a final determination; that although it usually and ordinarily constituted a disposition of the measure, still it might be again taken from the table. The Chair sustains the point of order of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and rules that the joint resolution can not be recommitted to the committee. The joint resolution is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I want to say a few words on this joint resolution before it comes to a vote and before it goes into the Senate.

A year ago, or possibly even six months ago, probably much might have been said in favor of some measure to bring relief to the newspaper world. That time has passed. To a large extent, if not to a full extent, a remedy has been found. The combination that then existed among certain manufacturers representing about 75 per cent of the news-print manufacture of the country has been broken, and to a considerable extent the processes of competition have resumed their operation. Under an agreement to which the Attorney General of the United States was a party, those manufacturers representing a commanding position in the world of news-print manufacturers, the Federal Trade Commission is now engaged in fixing a price for news print in the United States, not only the price of rolled print for the large papers but of sheet paper for the small papers as well. Under this process the price of paper has already been materially reduced. Newspapers have found that they were not compelled to deal with the mills they were formerly tied to by the secret conspiracy which had been formed. The result is that a reduction of 10 per cent and later a reduction of a larger per cent in the price of paper to all classes of consumers has taken place.

So I say the occasion for this legislation has passed. At all times it has seemed to me to be questionable legislation. I have a strong faith in the Federal Trade Commission. I believe in the measure which created it, and I believe that the Federal Trade Commission is performing a useful function. It gathered information which was finally used to break up this combination. It has been the watchman which has succeeded in protecting the newspapers of the country as the result of a long struggle.

The Federal Trade Commission is now engaged under an amicable arrangement in fixing prices and in adjusting distribution. I think it would be a mistake, Mr. President, at this juncture to attempt by legislation to modify that situation.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not yield for a question because I have only a few minutes.

Mr. STONE. It was a pertinent question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But there is an additional reason why I think it would be a mistake to put the Federal Trade Commission, which now performs a useful function, into the position provided by the bill. It would practically throw responsibility upon it which might break its back. If we put upon the Federal Trade Commission the work of actual distribution and manufacture of paper, as the bill was originally intended, it would go far beyond its legitimate function and raise very serious doubt as to any successful result.

But, Mr. President, there is another thing the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and others have said, that the real question in the print-paper world is one of production. There has been a real scarcity of print paper. There has not been enough print paper manufactured. It is easy to see what will be the result of putting the print-paper manufacture of the country in the hands of a Government agency. It will discourage enterprise; it will restrain investment. No one with money will go into the investment of print paper in paper mills while those mills are largely under the control of an agency of the Government. So I fear that this legislation would tend to restrict production and would really tend to embarrass the trade. It would do more. It would serve to throw the trade into a confusion which is entirely unnecessary.

I have a good deal of respect for Government agencies. We all know that most of the Government agencies which have undertaken in this emergency the conduct of business have met with very serious embarrassment and have not made a very creditable record.

So, Mr. President, I believe that this is not the time to pass this resolution. It may be said that in the form in which the bill now stands no one can tell exactly what it means. As reported by the committee it meant but one thing, but as the result of a series of amendments which have been injected into the bill it forms now a chapter in legislation which, I think, no one here can exactly understand, and I believe that it will not be a benefit to the newspaper world at this juncture to pass this legislation. I believe it is far better to allow the present amicable process to continue, under which, as the result of an agreement, the Federal Trade Commission is operating to fix prices and under which the manufacturers have been prohibited from forming the combinations which they have heretofore had in existence.

I believe that what has been done will be successful. The relief has already begun and the reduction in the price of print paper has already been considerable, not only as to large users of print paper but the small users as well.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I wish to say a word or two in response to the suggestions of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. Absolutely intolerable conditions are found to exist in the print paper and pulp business in this country. The Senate passed a resolution requesting the Trade Commission—or ordering it, if you please—to make a thorough investigation of this business in the United States and report its findings to the Senate. The Senate adopted that resolution, I understand, without any division. The report came to the Senate with an aggregation of facts that, without the use of intemperate language—that never does any good and is never used by men except, probably, in their excitement—I may say disclosed an intolerable trust, the most heartless, the most shameless, and to which a virtual admission was made by every man in it who was then before the court.

Before the Trade Commission made the investigation these people were selling print paper at 2½ to 3, 5, 8, 9, and 10 cents a pound. Some of them were making 1 cent a pound. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] admitted the other day, in spite of what the Senator from Utah had said in response to that sort of a statement made by me, that as soon as the report came out with the facts the gentlemen composing the trust made an agreement with the Trade Commission that they would sell the paper at 2½ cents a pound f. o. b. at the mill. As soon as the Attorney General brought a suit to set aside this unconscionable combination the profiteers immediately began to violate that contract and to sell paper at 3 cents, a menace to the whole industry of this country. It was unconscionable. The newspapers were entitled to the protection of anybody anywhere, and especially of the Senate of the United States that investigated it and the courts who found that there was an unconscionable trust robbing the people, even above the 29 per cent profit, and they had already received $17,000,000 in a year. Then we hear Senators talk about hurting the industry in this country. God help us to hurt every industry of that kind! The country newspapers, the Ohio papers from the State to which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] belongs, write a letter this morning. The Associated Ohio Dailies, of which the Senator from Ohio was a party, write this letter to Mr. Hosmer:

MY DEAR MR. HOSMER: I have your letter of December 6, and want to assure you that the Associated Ohio Dailies will be ready to co-operate with you in the matter of the Smith resolution now before Congress and on the Senate Calendar.

He states more that it is unnecessary for me to read, but this shows that they are for it. Is it not strange that exalted gentlemen who hold a high position, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], should say that the great newspapers from Pennsylvania did not want this measure to pass at all? No wonder they did not; and if the whole gang that has been represented could only kill every one of the poorer papers, even if they paid 10 cents a pound for paper, they would make a profit in the end, for they would be the only ones who would have newspaper circulation at all.

That was the purpose of this resolution, and it has been shown on this floor that Senators have voted for the violation of a contract. With a provision in the measure that a contract should not be violated Senators have stood here—dignified Senators—and voted against it, because they wanted it to appear that the bill carried a violation of a contract, and they were willing if the bill should happen to pass that it should not carry that provision rather than have the paper which they happened to be fortunate enough to be interested in get print paper at prices cheaper than their neighbors.

Mr. President, this is not aimed to help or support the big papers of this country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have only a minute left.

Mr. REED. I simply wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know, but there have been hundreds of questions asked, and they have been answered. I will yield in half a second.

Mr. President, that is the reason why this resolution is before the Senate. It was based on the belief that in the general circulation of newspapers they had the same right of protection as the right of the product on which they print. It was based in that particular on the ground of a war measure for nine-tenths of the papers. That is what they were charging them, and what they will continue to charge them, and already they are working with all their attorneys, and not one of the print-paper gentlemen who was indicted and convicted, not one of them, will tell the Trade Commission what it cost to make paper. So they wanted time to tell what their plans were. It is the same old, ingenious proposition that they could say to every publisher in the United States and user of paper that there was going to be an increase in the cost.

Mr. President, the matter is now before the Senate. When it votes, I hope no Senator here will vote that a contract ought to be violated. I hope Senators are not so unfamiliar with the conditions that led up to this measure that they have lost their conscience to that extent that they would make the bill as obnoxious as possible instead of attempting in good faith to amend it and improve it, and so that it would be as harmless as possible from their standpoint.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rose to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. REED. A question which he did not feel he could yield to at this time. While I want the most of my time, I should like to get a direct answer to this question: Is it or is it not true that arrangements have been perfected by which a price has been fixed upon print paper to hold until some date in the coming year?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I can tell the Senator all about it.

Mr. REED. It is that question I ask. Is that the fact?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Some six or eight indicted people have made a contract that they will furnish paper up to the 1st day of April at a certain price.

Mr. REED. Is it not true that those same six or eight indicted people, or formerly indicted people, have agreed that the Federal Trade Commission shall fix their price after the 1st day of April?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They have.

Mr. REED. Is it not true that those 8 or 10 indicted people are the producers of practically 75 per cent of all the print paper of the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is. They made the same contract before, if the Senator will permit me, and violated it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to state my position upon this bill as briefly as I can, if not for the enlightenment of the Senate, at least that I may put in the RECORD my own position.

When the newspapers began to suffer from the exactions of the combination to advance the price of wood pulp I was one of the first to call the attention of the Senate to that fact, and at the instance of great newspapers I introduced a resolution calling upon the Trade Commission to advise the Senate why it had not served the notice which it could serve under the Federal trade act and made the demand that it could make, which would have put these conspirators to answer before the court.

The Senate received in reply to that resolution which was passed a somewhat long and involved reply from the Federal Trade Commission. After reading it, I concluded that the Federal Trade Commission had reached the view that they had thought it best to lay the facts before the Attorney General of the United States, that certain indictments had been found and that therefore the law ought to be allowed to take its course without any interference on the part of Senators, and with the full acquiescence of the newspaper men who asked me to act, as I have stated, I proceeded no further in the matter, awaiting the outcome of those suits.

It now transpires, Mr. President, that those who were indicted in the suit pleaded guilty and effected an arrangement with the Attorney General of the United States or with the interested parties, to wit, the great newspaper publishers who had been back of these particular prosecutions in the effects to obtain redress from the Federal Government to which I have already adverted.

I take it that the Attorney General of the United States ought to have enough good sense and shrewdness not to make an idle or a foolish agreement, particularly when we find that agreement coupled with what appears to have been a very moderate sentence. Taking the situation in the light I am able to view it, it seems to me perfectly plain that the Attorney General and the court have substantially said to these great producers: "What we want at this time is results, practical results, rather than punishment. Your penalties will be mild in these courts, provided you will agree to furnish news-print paper at a reasonable price until the 1st of April, and thereafter put yourselves under the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission and let it fix prices."

I am not prepared to believe that Attorney General Gregory made an arrangement of that kind and left himself and left the country in such shape that they are liable at any moment to have this contract violated. I believe the Attorney General has worked out a plan by virtue of which the Federal Trade Commission will investigate the cost and will fix prices; that the only reason the agreement did not provide for an absolute price throughout the year was because it was not deemed possible to fix such a price justly without further hearing.

Believing that, Mr. President, I come to the consideration of this joint resolution. So far as the combination is concerned, unless the Attorney General of the United States had such an agreement as I have referred to, then he was very derelict in his duty for not insisting upon a severe penalty, a penalty that would have taught these conspirators a lesson they would always remember; and the Federal court was derelict in its duty if it did not impose such penalty, save and except the mildness of the penalty is to be explained by an understanding having been reached which would benefit the American public.

With that situation, therefore, what becomes of all the argument about trusts? What becomes of all the denunciation of the monopolies that rob little newspapers? That is water over the wheel; that is a thing that is passed. It was an outrage when it existed; but the authorities have undertaken to cure it and have undertaken to cure it by putting the jurisdiction of the fixation of prices in the Federal Trade Commission, the very tribunal to which the distinguished Senator who is the author of this measure appeals.

No man will go further than will I to punish trusts and monopolies; no man on this floor has a cleaner record for voting against trusts and monopolies and for their severe punishment than I myself have; no man would have rather seen these wood-pulp, news-print paper makers in the penitentiary than would I; but the authorities of the United States have seen fit, evidently for the benefit of the business, to impose light penalties, and, in lieu of a criminal penalty, to give the newspaper people the benefit of low prices.

Mr. President, in the one minute which remains to me I can not discuss this measure, but let me call attention to the fact that there is a complete demonstration that it was an undigested measure when it came here, because the sponsor for the joint resolution has himself seen fit to amend it and offer an amendment which completely changes the very fundamentals of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Now, will the Senator permit me to say——

Mr. REED. I can not permit the Senator to say much in my one minute, though I should like to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I appreciate that fact.

Mr. REED. The joint resolution is brought here, giving the Federal Trade Commission the authority to take this print paper over without a single word as to how it shall be distributed or who shall be entitled to it. A point like that overlooked in a measure is proof positive that the measure was not inspected, is proof positive that it was not understood, and is proof positive that it ought to go back for proper consideration.

Perhaps some legislation is necessary along this line, but certainly it is not this legislation. As the joint resolution is now amended we find the absurd provision in it that no newspaper shall print more than 16 pages. Nothing is said about the size of the pages; nothing is said about great periodicals——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think I ought to take only a few moments of the time of the Senate to again refer to the question that was brought up in reference to the newspapers having to pay 9 cents a pound for print paper. I think there were one or two such cases reported to the Federal Trade Commission, where they were charged 9 cents a pound away out in the western country, where a few pounds were purchased and taken from a roll of paper; in other words, it was shown that about once a month a little four-page pamphlet called a newspaper, but which did not buy more than 20 pounds at a time for one issue, had been charged 9 cents a pound—not by the manufacturer of the paper, but by the distributor of the paper, who had paid the freight upon the paper, and the purchaser took but a part of a roll and was charged 9 cents a pound, that is cited here as a wicked sample of what has been generally charged to the papers of this country for news-print paper.

Mr. President, in regard to the charge of a violation of the contract, I wish to say that the Federal Trade Commission was directed by the Senate, as I remember, to make an investigation of the cost of print paper. That investigation proceeded, and as it proceeded the Federal Trade Commission undertook to make an agreement with the paper manufacturers of this country as to the price at which print paper should be sold. An agreement was reached and a price named at 2½ cents a pound. Shortly after the agreement was reached the Attorney General, in behalf of the United States, brought suit against seven or eight paper manufacturers for the purpose of dissolving the companies, claiming that they had associated themselves together, and thus had formed a monopoly in restraint of trade.

It is true, Mr. President, that after they had made the agreement to sell paper at 2½ cents a pound, when the Attorney General began suit against them, they concluded that the agreement which they had made with the Federal Trade Commission, a branch of our Government, should not be binding. I think in many cases they then sold paper as high as 3 cents a pound instead of 2½ cents. But, further, Mr. President, when the cases were settled—and I am not going into the question of how they were settled, because that has already been stated on the floor a good many times—the Attorney General, as trustee in behalf of each and every individual, firm, or corporation publishing a newspaper and using news-print paper in his business or in its business in the United States, agreed with the seven or eight print-paper manufacturers who manufactured at least 75 per cent of the paper manufactured in the United States upon certain prices at which the paper should be sold. Those prices were based upon the investigation of the Federal Trade Commission and were the prices which that commission recommended. Here are those prices: From January 4, 1918, until April 1, 1918, for such news-print paper in rolls, $3 per hundred pounds f. o. b. at the mill in carload lots, and $3.25 per hundred pounds f. o. b. at the mill in less than carload lots.

Then, the agreement further provides:

> After April 1, 1918, a just and reasonable maximum price and terms of contract for the sale of all or any print paper shall be determined and fixed by the Federal Trade Commission after due hearing and investigation.

Why, Mr. President, the agreement that has been reached is such that the Federal Trade Commission has absolute power to fix the price at which print paper shall be sold in the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. By the manufacturers not a party to that agreement?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well, I have already said manufacturers making 75 per cent of news-print paper in the United States are included in this agreement. Furthermore, Mr. President, I have no doubt whatever that the manufacturers of the other 25 per cent will follow suit just as soon as the Attorney General can get the signatures of the parties to the agreement. Why is any legislation needed when we know that such an arrangement is in force to-day? The only reason this legislation is sought is to give, indirectly, the power to the President of the United States to say to any one paper in the United States, or to all of them, that they shall not have print paper if, in his judgment, it is better for the public good that they should not have it. It involves a greater censorship than was ever heretofore thought of or ever tried to be put into effect.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to correct the Senator as to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I have only a few minutes, and I hope the Senator will wait until I conclude.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand the Senator's position.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Arizona has had his 10 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I merely wish to say that only 55 per cent of the paper is handled by the companies included in this arrangement. I have here [exhibiting] the showing of every one of them.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will let me proceed. Let us grant, Mr. President, that what the Senator has said is true, although he has said several times to-day that the output controlled by the so-called combine was about 75 per cent; but granting that it is only 55 per cent, that does not change the principle of the pending legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to suggest to the Senator that his designation of the reason for giving this great power to the President is hardly accurate, because the amendment proposing to put this matter in the control of the President was not agreed to and is not in the joint resolution now.

Mr. SMOOT. The power is given in section 3, but be that as it may, it gives the power to the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is right.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Federal Trade Commission would not deny a request of the President of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not mean to say, does he, that the Federal Trade Commission will not exercise its own judgment, and that it is completely subservient to the President?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah is willing to say that there is no telling what the joint resolution, if it ever passes the Senate, will contain when it comes out of conference; there is no telling what amendments may be made in the other House.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be, but the Senator is speaking of the joint resolution as it stands now, and it gives no such power to the President.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah will stand corrected as far as section 1 is concerned, inasmuch as the amendment proposing to transfer the power to the President has been disagreed to, and it has been placed in the Federal Trade Commission rather than in the President, although in effect that does not change the situation a particle.

Mr. President, I do not care to say anything more about the measure at this time and hope the Senate will defeat the passage of the resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona has reserved for a separate vote in the Senate the amendment inserting section 5. The question is on concurring in the other amendments not reserved.

The amendments not reserved were concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona has reserved a separate vote on the amendment adding section 5 on which he has requested the yeas and nays. Is the request of the Senator from Arizona seconded?

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section at the end of the joint resolution as follows:

> SEC. 5. That from and after 30 days from the approval of this act no newspaper shall be issued containing more than 16 pages such as were ordinarily printed by such paper.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of concurring in the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). As I have a pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LODGE] is absent on account of death in his family. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. NORRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who was called away from the Chamber and who has not yet come back. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment if present, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. He not being present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHIELDS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], who is absent on account of illness. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], but upon this joint resolution and the amendments to it he is paired with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], but under that pair I am authorized to vote when I think proper on this measure. I vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDWICK. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who is absent on official business. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the absence of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] on important public business.

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the negative). I voted without noticing the absence of the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I have a general pair, but I am informed that on this amendment he would vote as I have voted. Therefore I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I have not regarded this amendment seriously, and I really did not mean my vote seriously, so I should like the consent of the Senate to change it.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] and that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I also announce that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is unavoidably absent and that the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 4, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—4.

Jones, Wash.	McCumber	Ransdell	Sherman

NAYS—53.

So the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was nonconcurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] now offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 3, as printed in the bill, and to insert:

That the President, during the present war emergency, shall have power by proclamation to declare that such imports of mechanical and chemical pulp and their products as he shall deem necessary in order to fully effectuate the objects of this act shall be sold and distributed under the supervision and regulation of the Federal Trade Commission, as provided for in section 1 of this act, except that existing contracts shall not be interfered with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona asks for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARDWICK (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who is detained from the Senate on account of official business. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. If he were present he would vote "nay," and I would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] I withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous roll call I vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHIELDS (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as before I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made upon the last roll call I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is still detained from the Senate by illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

The result was announced—yeas 52, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—52.

Ashurst	Kenyon	Pittman	Stone
Bankhead	Kirby	Poindexter	Sutherland

So the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to strike out section 4 and to insert in lieu thereof the matter which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 4 as amended, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That any person or persons engaging in a conspiracy to limit the production or sale of print paper, or to fix the price of the same, or to create a monopoly in the manufacture or sale thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years, and shall be fined not less than $150,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator's amendment if he does not strike out the whole of section 4 of the joint resolution. He can put in afterwards whatever he wants as to conspiracy; but I hope the Senator will not press the amendment to strike out section 4, for he will admit, and everyone else will admit, that if section 4 is struck out it leaves no power on earth in the joint resolution. If section 4 is struck out, it is equivalent to voting against the joint resolution itself. The question will come up better, in my judgment, on the square question of passing the joint resolution than on an amendment that will make the measure absolutely nugatory, in my judgment.

I say that, although I was not able to catch as clearly as I should like to, because of the noise about me, the precise words of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the joint resolution as drawn gives the Federal Trade Commission authority to control, supervise, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and chemical pulp. That, of course, gives it jurisdiction over all of the activities and all of the energies employed in making paper. As I stated awhile ago in a colloquy, it gives the Federal Trade Commission jurisdiction over every instrumentality, from the man who wields the ax in the forest to cut down the trees to the transportation company that hauls the material to the mill that manufactures it and to the agencies that distribute it.

The section giving that broad power to the Federal Trade Commission is followed by section 4, which provides that every order of the Federal Trade Commission shall be obligatory on every individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, or the responsible head or heads thereof, who shall do any of the things I have heretofore referred to; and then it is followed with the provision that a failure to comply, not with the orders of the Federal Trade Commission, not with the laws of Congress, not with the laws of our country, but with the orders of the Federal Trade Commission, shall constitute a felony, which shall be punishable by three years' imprisonment and a fine.

Mr. President, if this joint resolution authorized the Federal Trade Commission to seize the products of these plants, to go into court or outside of court to take possession of the property of individuals, and left the individual to his recourse in the civil courts of the country, it would be a very radical measure, but it might be tolerable. But, Mr. President, the joint resolution proposes to say to every man engaged in this industry: "Obey the orders of the Federal Trade Commission or go to the penitentiary."

No matter how arbitrary the order may be, no matter how destructive it may be, no matter how unjust it may be, no matter how illegal it may be, every man who refuses to obey does so with the threat of the penitentiary hanging over him; and this is proposed in a country where we claim to have a Constitution, in a country where it always has been said that a man was entitled to his day in court, and to be tried according to the law of the land; and the proposition here is to send a man to the penitentiary because he does not obey the order, not of the law itself, but of a board or tribunal!

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator, if he will permit me, if that is not true of the national-defense act; if the very same language does not occur also in the food and coal act and in the national-defense act, except that the penalty is three times as great?

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, if any such language occurs in any act of Congress, it is to the shame of Congress, and it is to the shame of our country. This has always been understood to be a government of law and not a government of men; a government in which the rules by which the citizen is to be guided are laid down by the lawmaking power that the citizen has created. It is a new chapter in American jurisprudence and in constitutional development or disintegration when it is proposed to say that whenever some board issues an order that a man does not see fit to obey he shall not have his day in court to settle his civil rights in a civil tribunal, but that if he fails to turn over his property or obey the mandate of that board he shall be instantly haled before a criminal court and started to the penitentiary.

That sort of legislation, Mr. President, I do not believe finds a parallel in Austria. I do not believe you can parallel it in Prussia. I think you would have to go to Turkey to find its real source.

Now, the chairman in charge of this bill holds before me some book, in which he says we have done similar things before. That is a miserable begging of a question. If we have done things of this kind before, if this Congress has been reckless to the people's rights, it is so much the more reason why we should pause now. Who is it in his calm moments can deem it safe to vest such powers as these in men?

Mr. President, the amendment I have offered proposes to punish as crimes those things that are crimes, those things that have been recognized as crimes. It is proposed to penalize these institutions and men if they shall conspire in restraint of trade, if they shall seek in any way to fix prices, to limit output. That far we can justly and properly go, and no further than that should we go.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I raise the question that the Senator has occupied his time on this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I thought the Senator offered an amendment.

Mr. REED. And you spoke to it——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have not said a word in the way of a speech. I interrupted the Senator.

Mr. REED. For at least seven or eight minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I interrupted you.

Mr. REED. The Senator did not interrupt me. I offered an amendment, and before I said a word the Senator spoke. I would have no objection, but if we are going to have rules we should observe them

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In order to avoid that, I move to amend the Senator's amendment by striking out the first clause of it.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the speech the Senator has delivered is so much in line with so many great speeches he has delivered, never a weak one, in this body but along the same identical lines, that I was wondering whether the Senator voted for or against the national-defense bill. If he voted for it, he is subject to all the denunciation that he has been heaping on the balance of us. If he voted against it, he is perfectly consistent. I was wondering whether he voted for the food and coal regulations. I think the Senator probably voted against that measure.

Mr. REED. I undoubtedly did.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If he did, the Senator was consistent; but in the national-defense bill there are provisions forty times worse than the very one against which he inveighs now. If the Senator will permit me, I will read a section from that act.

Mr. REED. I was going to ask the Senator to find where there was something forty times worse in the English tongue.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will show it. It was forty times worse, according to the Senator's own statement, than what is contained in this bill. It is very easy to say how evil something is; it is easy to say there is something equally awful; yet it does not make any difference; "I know it is awful, but this is awfuller than the awful mistake I made last week."

What was the national defense bill? I will not read all of its 128 sections, but I will read part of it. Under the section providing for the purchase or procurement of military supplies the President—is hereby authorized to take immediate possession of any such plant or plants—

I do not do that in this bill—and, through the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, to manufacture therein in time of war, or when war shall be imminent, such product or material as may be required—

Listen, Senator from Missouri, to your own criticism—and any individual, firm, company, association, or corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, or the responsible head or heads thereof, failing to comply with the provisions of this section—

And this section not only gives the power that is given in this measure, but broader, giving the power under the head of the department—shall be deemed guilty of a felony and, upon conviction, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $50,000.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield for a question, since he is making this entirely personal?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is not personal.

Mr. REED. That section applies to the commandeering by the United States of property to be used in war, does it not?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. REED. It provides simply that the Federal Government can take it, and it provides a method of sure and speedy payment, and then it punishes the individual for refusing to turn over the property under those circumstances.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. My friend is not asking me a question.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean that that is a parallel with this miserable thing he has produced here?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; I claim that the thing you voted for is more miserable than this.

Mr. REED. You may claim it, but nobody will believe it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I put it as boldly as that. The Senator makes a naked assertion.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Government of the United States is paying millions upon millions of dollars for this very product right now.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator pretend that this bill is the taking over of property?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. As there was under this section. That is precisely the case with this present outrage.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator pretend that the bill we have now proposes to take property and pay for property and take it as a war measure and turn it over?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I must ask the Senator to excuse me from permitting him to make a speech. I will answer any direct question.

Mr. REED. I was asking a question.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know; but it takes so long to ask a question that the Senator will make a long speech before I can get through.

Mr. REED. Very well, proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, this is nothing in the world but the same old condemnation of everything that is trying to get from under the operation of these combinations that are taking advantage of war times to rob the people. The Senator is not conscious of any such purpose as that underlying it. He has just one single, solitary thing that convinces and persuades him without his knowledge of it. No man has higher respect for anybody than I entertain for my very able and genial friend from Missouri, but we all know our friend from Missouri. He is a natural, everlastingly pugnacious, fighting individual with the kindest heart in the world. He can not argue a case but that he has to get mad.

Mr. President, the object of the Senator's amendment is for us to take all we can get, take all our machinery and see if we can not hunt out and find this combination in restraint of trade. We have got to work for months and months under his amendment to find out whether or not some people are violating the law, and if they are whether they are doing it under the particular combination in this particular case before the bill would operate.

No, my friend wants to be perfectly fair. He does not want to denounce the things that I am advocating as being outrageous when the things he advocated a few weeks ago are just the same. Both of us are too good friends to have the least feeling about a matter of our own differences or about what we may say pleasantly of each other in this body or elsewhere, but it is not fair from my standpoint to be assailed for the very thing on account of which the Senator is assailing me when, in my judgment, he did the same thing in a bill passed a few weeks ago.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that this amendment may not prevail, for it only takes all possible power out of the bill itself. Vote as you please, whether it shall be operative or not in the final analysis, but I insist that as fair men and Senators of the United States it should be the effort of all of us to keep the bill in as good a state as we can make it, that we should make it as good as possible, and if we can not get it good enough in the minds of many they had better vote against it. Let us make it good in the minds of those who will vote for it, and let us not play this schoolboy prank of voting that newspapers shall only print seven columns and inveigh against Senators rising on this floor and voting for what they themselves voted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to speak to the amendment to the amendment. I regret exceedingly that my course in the Senate has not met with the approval of the Senator from Arizona or that I should bring myself within the characterization which he has seen fit to put in the RECORD.

So far as I am concerned, I have always voted my honest judgment on the floor of the Senate. I have never pettifogged nor played demagogue either on the floor of the Senate or elsewhere. I would not stand before this body and assert that a bill which had been passed was forty times as bad as this bill and seek to excuse the badness of this bill by an argument of that kind, particularly if I had voted for the bill that was forty times as bad.

The loose statement made by the Senator, inadvertently made, has a fitting illustration in the fact that I asked the Senator to produce a sample of the bill that was forty times as bad and he read us a clause from the defense act which authorized the President of the United States, strictly as a war measure, strictly as a military measure, to take possession of property necessary for the preservation of the Army and the Navy, but not to take possession until and unless provision was made for payment. Then in order that the President might not find himself resisted but should be permitted to take the property for military purposes, it was provided that resistance to that lawful authority of the President's should be punished as a crime.

The Senator tells us that because a man voted that the Government of the United States had authority to take possession of propery for military purposes and pay for it, and that resistance to that lawful act should be made a crime, the Senator has the audacity to tell us that that is forty times worse than making it a crime punishable by the penitentiary to do something that the Federal Trade Commission said you should not do.

Now, I have no quarrel with the Senator. He has not agreed with me on many measures of legislation. We think differently; that is all. He has a right to his view of the Constitution, and I have a right to mine. I have stood upon the floor of the Senate and have said that the Constitution ought to be regarded on the floor of the Senate if in any place on earth, and I have objected to ruthlessly disregarding it, and every time I have so objected I have unfortunately found myself in opposition to the Senator from Arizona. For that I am sorry, but I do not regret the fact that I have occasionally lifted my voice in the defense of my country.

Mr. President, the amendment I have offered I offered in good faith. It proposes to say simply this, that if news-print paper manufacturers shall conspire to fix prices, to restrain trade, to create monopoly, for those crimes or any of them they may be severely punished. This substitutes law for the punishment of a defined crime for the purpose of a bill which is to send men to the penitentiary for refusing to obey the commands of other men.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair as on the former vote and withhold my vote.

Mr. HARDWICK (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the last vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I repeat the announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the former vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIELDS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before of my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Repeating the announcement which I made upon the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. POINDEXTER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. I am somewhat confused as to which amendment we are voting on. Is it the Smith amendment or the Reed amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the Reed amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I make the same announcement as before. I am paired with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. I understand that he has not voted, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Borah	Hardwick	McKellar	Sutherland
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	McLean	Townsend
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	McNary	Trammell

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is in the Senate and open to further amendment.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona and Mr. SMOOT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARDWICK (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as formerly, I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is absent to-day, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHIELDS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He has authorized me to vote as I see proper on this joint resolution. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating my announcement as on the last roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of illness.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. McLEAN. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. If he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] on account of important business. I am informed that if the Senator from Kansas were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS. My colleague [Mr. LODGE], whose absence has been announced, is paired on this question with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is unavoidably absent from the Senate, and that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is absent on official business.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—32.

Ashurst	Kellogg	Pittman	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Kirby	Poindexter	Stone
Beckham	McKellar	Pomerene	Swanson

So the joint resolution was rejected.

DEATH OF MAJ. AUGUSTUS PEABODY GARDNER.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the death of Maj. Augustus Peabody Gardner, formerly a Member of this Congress and who resigned therefrom to enter the military service of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
JANUARY 15, 1918.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Maj. Augustus Peabody Gardner, formerly a Member of this Congress and who resigned therefrom to enter the military service of the United States, and whose death occurred at Camp Wheeler, Ga., on Monday, the 14th day of January, 1918.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I send the following resolutions to the desk, which I ask may be read, and I ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Senate resolution 183.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Maj. Augustus Peabody Gardner, formerly a Member of this Congress and who resigned therefrom to enter the military service of the United States, and whose death occurred at Camp Wheeler, Ga., on Monday, the 14th day of January, 1918.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think these resolutions are without precedent, but I am confident that there can be no objection, but hearty approval of their purpose. Maj. Gardner, whose death was announced in this morning's papers, was elected a Member of the present Congress. He was the first Member to resign his seat to go into the military service, and the body of which he was a Member has to-day taken similar action to that proposed in these resolutions, and has adjourned out of respect to his memory.

I am very glad that this gives me an opportunity to make one or two comments which I think may not be out of place at this time. Mr. Gardner was a man of strong views. It was not necessary to agree with his conclusions in order to recognize his courage and independence of expression. That has been typical of his career during the 16 years he served in the House of Representatives. His early training led him to have positive views on the question of his country's preparedness. More than 20 years ago he was a member of the Massachusetts State Senate and chairman of the military committee of that body. Later he served with credit in the Spanish-American War. He has served in the Massachusetts militia, and his natural aptitude and taste for military subjects were instrumental in bringing him to the conclusion that this Government was totally unprepared and it would be criminally negligent to allow such a condition to continue. Having these views and the enthusiasm and temperament of the evangelist of the Billy Sunday type, he did not hesitate to strike and strike hard in favor of the views he entertained. It may be justly said of him that he had quite as much to do as any other man in centering attention on our military condition and military necessities. However, he not only preached but he acted, and when we declared war, although he had passed the meridian of life, he did not hesitate to go into service in a branch of the Army suitable for one of his years and physical condition. But even this did not satisfy his sense of obligation and duty, for he voluntarily—and this is one of the few instances in my knowledge of such action being taken—asked that he be demoted from the rank of colonel to that of major so that he might serve directly with troops. By doing so he has set an example to the youth of this country, especially to a large number of young men with whom we are more or less familiar who have endeavored to get into branches of the service not of the fighting forces. In serving his country he has met his death with as much courage and devotion as if he had lost his life in the trenches in France. It is for these reasons, the lesson which his life carries, and because of his having been a Member of this Congress, that I move the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. President, I move, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 16, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 15, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our heavenly Father, our hearts turn to Thee in fervent prayer for all who are suffering the rigors of an exceptionally severe winter, especially those who have been and are without fuel in their homes; and we pray most fervently that wind and wave may be tempered to our soldiers and sailors.

Our hearts are touched by the news of the death of one who filled a conspicuous place on the floor of this House for many years, and was first to resign his position to follow the flag in defense of the principles he upheld as a Representative and a statesman. Comfort, we beseech Thee, those who knew and admired him.

His stricken family, uphold and sustain them in the blessed thought that life is ever lord of death, and love can never lose its own, for Thou dost live and reign.

Hear us, we pray Thee, in the name of Him who said: "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth on me shall never die." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. VARE, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for two weeks, on account of important business.

DEATH OF MAJ. AUGUSTUS P. GARDNER.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUFKIN] have permission to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUFKIN. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound sorrow that I rise to announce the death of my predecessor in this House, your colleague for the past 15 years, Maj. Augustus P. Gardner. At 5.05 o'clock yesterday afternoon, in the base hospital at Camp Wheeler, Ga., Maj. Gardner answered his last roll call either as a legislator or as a soldier, a victim of camp pneumonia.

With the same courage which he ever displayed as a Member of this House, with the same fortitude which characterized his action when the President called for volunteers, Augustus P. Gardner cheerfully answered the command of that great General from above and gave his life as a sacrifice to the cause for which he had not only preached but practiced, the future safety of our country.

I think I can truthfully say that Maj. Gardner was the first man in the American Congress to warn his fellow countrymen of the importance and necessity of strengthening our national defenses in every way possible. It was characteristic of the man, therefore, that when America was called upon to do her part in the world-wide war now upon us that Augustus P. Gardner should be the first Member of this House to resign his seat and offer his services to his country's call. It was further characteristic of the man, after a service of a few months in the United States Army, to establish the almost unknown precedent of asking for a demotion from a colonel on the staff to a major in the line in order that he might more fittingly fight his share of our Nation's battles.

It was the privilege of you men here to have been associated with Augustus P. Gardner as a legislator, some during his entire service, others for a much shorter period. It was my privilege, however, to have been associated with him in a more personal manner, as his secretary, as his political associate, and as my dearest and best friend and benefactor during a service of nearly 16 years. I knew him before he became a Member of this body, I knew him as a Member, and I knew him as a soldier of the United States. He was always the same. The office or the uniform made no difference. He was always a man in all that the term implies.

You who have served with him, whether it be as an associate on this side of the Chamber or as an opponent on the other side, know that when he fought it was with both hands and with all the strength at his command. But you also know that Augustus P. Gardner never struck a blow below the belt and never took an unfair advantage of an adversary. And if this applies to this House, it also applies to his private life and to his long list of political campaigns in Massachusetts. His friends loved him; his opponents admired him as a man who did not know the meaning of the word deceit and whose whole lexicon was based on the theory of justice and fair treatment toward his fellow man.

Mr. Speaker, there will probably be many more sacrifices of good and true men before this terrible war is over. But when the history is finally written, when the toll is at last complete, I am proud to think that there will be no soldier, be he officer or private, of whom it can more truly be said—

> He was a man,
> Take him for all in all;
> I shall not look upon his like again—

Than your former colleague, my friend and benefactor, a statesman, a soldier, and, best of all, a man, Augustus P. Gardner.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 226.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Maj. Augustus Peabody Gardner, formerly a Member of this Congress, and who resigned therefrom to enter the military service of the United States, and whose death occurred at Camp Wheeler, Ga., on Monday, the 14th day of January, 1918.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope, subject to the approval of the family, to offer a resolution later for holding the funeral services either in the House or the Rotunda of the Capitol.

The Clerk read the further resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, this House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolutions?

There was no objection.

The resolutions were agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 16, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 16, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray that the ministry vouchsafed to us to-day out of all the incidents of life and the conditions that surround us may be a spiritual ministry, that we may be led to contemplate the spiritual origin of life and the significance of all the facts of life in the light of its spiritual origin. Grant, we pray, that Thy gracious Spirit may be ministered unto us by the power of Thy holy Spirit within us, that we may overcome the world through our faith in Thee. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. JAMES and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

RENT OF BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of rents received from properties located on sites of proposed public buildings purchased by the Government in the city of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, schedules and lists of papers, documents, and so forth, on the files of the Treasury Department, which are useless and have no historic value, and requesting action looking to their disposition. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Chair appoints the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] the committee on the part of the Senate. The Secretary will notify the House thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 3235) amending section 32, Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916.

STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I present a summary prepared on the number of days lost in strikes and lockouts in the United States and Germany. The facts are based on the report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Department of Labor, of date December, 1917. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS IN THE UNITED STATES AND GERMANY.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, Department of Labor, in its December, 1917, issue, declares that in the last month for which it has figures, September, 1917, 283 strikes and 7 lockouts are reported. The bureau estimates that this is incomplete and that "the number of strikes in the country probably approach 450 in the month under consideration."

It is stated that in 171 of such strikes 147,349 persons were involved; of the remaining 112 strikes no figures are available as to the number of persons involved. It is further stated with respect to the duration of strikes that the average of the least number given is about 7½ days. The number of persons involved in lockouts is inconsiderable and may therefore be put aside. But taking the number of persons involved in 171 strikes, which is 147,349, and multiplying by the average duration of seven days, it is apparent that on this minimum at least 1,031,443 work days were lost by strike during the month of September, 1917. This, from the condition of the statistics, is obviously a great underestimate.

The same number of the Review gives the figures for strikes and lockouts in Germany, in the calendar year 1916, from volume 323 of the Statistics of the German Empire, appearing in the Bremer Bürger-Zeitung, Bremen, August 6, 1917. From this it appears that 240 strikes, affecting 124,183 workers, were reported for 1916. The Review then says:

"The real extent of labor disputes is best indicated by the number of work days lost, which is obtained by multiplying the number of striking or lockout workers with the duration of the disputes."

Not giving the average duration but evidently following this process, the Review announces a loss of 245,404 workdays by the German strikes.

It thus appears that taking an underestimated minimum as the basis of American figures and the official statistics of the German Empire that four times as many workdays were lost through strikes in the month of September, 1917, in the United States than was lost in the whole of the year 1916, from the same cause, in the entire German Empire

THE LABOR SITUATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present further a copy of a report made by the National Industrial Conference Board relating to the same subject, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

GENTLEMEN: Some months ago, at the suggestion of Mr. Howard Coffin, a committee of five was appointed by the National Industrial Conference Board to advise with him in matters relating to the economics of industry, which committee has been officially designated the advisory committee of the National Industrial Conference Board. At his suggestion we are here to present certain statements and recommendations regarding the relations of employer and employee and the adjustment of possible differences during the period of the war.

The National Industrial Conference Board is a cooperative and advisory body of representative manufacturers constituted through the selection of two members by and from each of the following national associations:

American Cotton Manufacturers' Association.
American Paper and Pulp Association.
Electrical Manufacturers' Club.
Manufacturing Chemists' Association of the United States.
National Association of Cotton Manufacturers.
National Association of Manufacturers.
National Association of Wool Manufacturers.
National Automobile Chamber of Commerce.
National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association.
National Council for Industrial Defense.
National Erectors' Association.
National Founders' Association.
National Implement and Vehicle Manufacturers' Association.
National Metal Trades Association.
Rubber Association of America (Inc.).
Silk Association of America.
United Typothetæ and Franklin Clubs of America.

In order that the statements and recommendations which the committee here makes may be truly representative of industrial opinion, we have called to our counsel the executive heads of the foregoing 17 national associations, comprising in their membership more than 18,000 manufacturers, representatives of a majority of State associations of manufacturers, and, in addition, a large number of executive officers of industrial organizations engaged either directly or indirectly on the production of war essentials. These statements and recommendations express the unanimous opinion of this large body of representative manufacturers.

In approaching a discussion of the relation of employer and employee at this critical hour we believe we are animated by a spirit worthy of the time and place and the gravity of the circumstances, which makes an equitable and harmonious adjustment of employment relations a matter of national necessity

The Council of National Defense has deemed this subject of such consequence that it created a committee on labor, substantially directed and controlled by representatives of the largest national unions, which, after due deliberation, issued, through its executive committee, a statement apparently intended to declare certain fundamental policies of industrial relationship which should apply during the period of the war. Perhaps the most important sentence of this statement was the declaration that "neither employers nor employees shall endeavor to take advantage of the country's necessities to change existing standards." Differences of interpretation and opinion led to a further amplification and explanation and accompanying declarations, which were indorsed by the Council of National Defense.

These were to the effect that standards of safety and service established by State or Federal law should remain in effect unless and until, under the exigencies of war, the Council of National Defense, after proper investigation, should recommend some modification as essential to the national safety. It was likewise urged that inasmuch as the standard of living was particularly dependent upon the purchasing power of wages, no arbitrary wage change should be sought through the medium of strikes or lockouts by employer or employee without affording the established State or Federal mediums of arbitration or conciliation an opportunity to adjust disputes without stopping production, and is was especially urged that "employers and employees in private industries should not attempt to take advantage of the existing abnormal conditions to change the standards which they were unable to change under normal conditions."

Despite these timely admonitions, we find ourselves entering the fifth month of war faced with unprecedented demands for war production seriously interrupted and delayed by numerous strikes and threats of strikes in every part of the country, some of which are likely to assume the proportions of a national interruption of essential service in our factories and shipyards.

Let it be clearly understood that we, without equivocation, indorse the maintenance of every necessary regulation for safety and health and the fair adjustment of wages in accordance with the American standard of living and the increasing cost of its maintenance. So far as we know the American manufacturer can and will pay any advance in wages which expresses corresponding labor efficiency. Hours of labor have been universally contracting under the influence of many causes, the chief of which has been the always increasing development of labor-saving machinery constantly multiplying the producing power of human effort. We enter the war with the average hours of labor in American manufacture, as shown by the Government manufacturers census of 1914, very considerably less than the average hours of labor recommended for either sex in British industry in the reports of the health of munition workers' committee to the minister of munitions during 1916.

We also submit that the Naval Consulting Board, reporting upon its preliminary investigation of manufacturing establishments capable of munition work found the total number to be 18,654, and that of these 16,787, or 89 per cent, were "open" shops. Of 1,950 establishments usable for the manufacture of ammunition powder and explosives, guns and gun material, gun carriages, limbers and accessories, personal military equipment, tools, gauges and punches, machine tools and aeroplanes, all but 73 are "open" shops. (S. Doc. No. 664, 64th Cong., 2d sess., p. 40.)

With respect to wages, a great body of munition production for the Government proceeds under a contract wage law, assuring at least time and a half for all overtime in excess of eight hours, so that for like tasks industrial wages for war work are universally increased by the operation of statute in every plant whose contracts come within its scope. Antecedent to our entrance into the war general wage increases in large amounts had been voluntarily given throughout the generally prosperous industries, so that it may be fairly said that our wage scale on the average was, actually as well as nominally, greatly superior to that of any belligerent country. But despite this condition and the increase by statute of wages for the subject matter of our own war production, it is inevitable that wage differences will continue to arise. The vital thing is that such disputes shall be adjusted without interruption of production necessary to national defense. To this end we believe that manufacturers are ready and anxious to cooperate in the establishment of a representative and equitable system of adjustment for the period of the war.

There are, however, other "standards" of employment than those relating to hours and wages which are of critical importance, not merely to efficient production but to the institutions of a free people. Strikes are threatened and are occurring in increasing numbers to compel the exclusive employment of union men. This, we emphatically urge, is contrary to any fair interpretation of the spirit and letter of the fundamental policy declared by the council, "that employers and employees in private industries should not attempt to change the standards which they were unable to change under normal conditions."

Can there be any doubt that to undertake to open a "closed" shop or close an "open" shop under the exigencies of war is an evident attempt "to change the standard which they were unable to change under normal conditions"? This is the view frankly presented by Mr. Thomas, the English labor representative, in his suggestions to the committee on labor of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, when, recommending conduct predicated upon his British experience, he declared, according to the American Federationist for August of this year:

"Let the employer say, 'I am not desirous of taking advantage of the war to break down something that I never believed in.' On the other hand, let the employes say, 'Whilst anxious to maintain the law, we are not anxious to take advantage of the war to enforce something during the war that we could not obtain in peace times.' With both sides recognizing that, I repeat, I believe they will find a solution."

Secretary of Labor Wilson apparently indorsed this view when, on April 23, 1917, in an explanatory statement on behalf of the council, he said "that where either an employer or an employee has been unable under normal conditions to change the standards to their own liking, they should not take advantage of the present abnormal conditions to establish new standards." This, we urge, declares a sound policy and a fair interpretation for the council to place upon its recommendation.

Moreover, there is a labor shortage which will necessarily be intensified by withdrawing from industry the personnel of its contribution to our armed forces. In this crisis America needs the service of every citizen. We can no more depend upon one class to operate our factories than to fill the ranks of our armies. Therefore it is inconceivable that the Government can tolerate, much less approve, any proposal which makes membership in a private organization a prerequisite to a citizen securing employment in production for the war. All citizens, union or nonunion, are equally entitled to and must receive like consideration from their Government and equally enjoy the full protection of national authority in every circumstance of daily life. The assertion is untenable that a minority or a majority of employees in any industry by voluntarily associating themselves into an organization acquire authority or right over the equal liberty of those who do not care to do likewise. As was said in a great public document:

"This all seems too plain for argument. Common sense and common law alike denounce those who interfere with this fundamental right of the citizen. The assertion of the right seems trite and commonplace, but that land is blessed where the maxims of liberty are commonplaces." (Report of Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, 1902.)

To win this war we can sacrifice everything but the principles of the Republic and the fundamental rights of citizenship it was founded to protect. The right to pursue a lawful calling and to live free from annoyance and molestation is the primary, if not the greatest, privilege which society is founded to sustain.

The British policy expressed in its munition acts is that all labor, whether it be that of employer or the employee, of men or women, of union or nonunion, of the skilled or unskilled, shall be employed to the best advantage of the country. Neither restriction nor discrimination, nor, in "controlled shops," strikes or lockouts are permitted. A ministry of munitions is successfully promoting the expeditious output of munitions by employing all the available labor to that end. With due regard to the plant and equipment of each establishment, it has successfully subordinated conflicts between employer and employee to the winning of the war.

To the same great end we propose through you, in the presence of the public, that employer and employee, organized and unorganized, shall pledge themselves to prevent strikes and lockouts, to deal rationally and unselfishly through a representative tribunal with serious wage disputes, and for the period of the war not compel or attempt to compel discriminations in employment by strikes, threats of strikes, or lockouts.

We further submit that, under the present circumstances of national necessity, it is the duty of both the manufacturer and of organized labor to jointly cooperate with the Government that sedition in any of its manifold forms, whether masquerading in the name of labor or under any other guise, shall be ruthlessly exposed and suppressed.

To epitomize our conclusions and recommendations we urge:

1. That as a basis of mutual understanding employer and employee recognize and agree that now and for the period of the war continuous efficient production can alone equip and sustain our military forces. Every dispute, whatever its motive, which interrupts production furthers the ends and operates to the advantage of the public enemy.

2. The Nation needs the service of every citizen. Its industrial workers are as indispensable to victory as the soldier on the firing line. The nonunion man is as necessary in the factory as he is in the Army. On economic as well as indisputable moral grounds the Government can therefore neither permit nor tolerate the exclusion of any laborer from productive employment. We, therefore, urge the council to adopt and reassert as its guiding principle the fundamental American doctrine authoritatively stated by the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission with the approval of representatives of both employers and unions included in its membership and commended as the basis of industrial adjustments by Presidents Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson.

"That no person shall be refused employment or in any way discriminated against on account of membership or nonmembership in any labor organization; that there shall be no discrimination against, or interference with, any employee who is not a member of any labor organization by members of such organization."

3. The council's reiterated recommendation that "employers and employees in private industries should not attempt to take advantage of the existing abnormal conditions to change the standards which they were unable to change under normal conditions" should now receive an unambiguous interpretation to assure its practical application as a working principle. To this end we propose:

(a) That applied to existing statutory regulations intended to promote safety and health, it shall be agreed that for the period of the war there shall be no suspension or modification of such provisions, except upon recommendation of the Council of National Defense after due investigation by its agencies and when, in its judgment, required by the exigencies of war.

(b) Applied to wages, demands shall be tested by the prevailing local standard of the establishment in effect at the beginning of the war with such modification as may be shown to be necessary to meet any demonstrated advance in the cost of living.

(c) Applied to hours, the standard shall be those established by statute or prevailing in the establishment at the beginning of the war, subject to change only when in the opinion of the Council of National Defense it is necessary to meet the requirements of the Government.

(d) Applied to what are commonly known as "open" or "closed" shop conditions, it shall be understood and agreed that every employer entering the period of the war with a union shop shall not by a lockout or other means undertake to alter such conditions for the duration of the war, nor shall any combination of workmen undertake during the like period to "close" an "open" shop.

4. Adopting these standards as the basis of its operation, we recommend the creation of a Federal board to adjust labor disputes for the duration of the war; the activities of this board to be confined to disputes growing out of employment on the subject matter of war production for the Government. To such board shall be primarily referred for final settlement all major disputes of the nature suggested, with full power to create all machinery necessary to execute its functions. Its decisions must bind all parties to the dispute. It should be constituted equally of representatives of employees, employers, and the Government, representatives of the latter to hold the deciding voice in the event of an equal division of opinion. It is to be further understood and agreed that there shall be no interruption of production by strike, lockout, or other means within the control of employer or employee.

5. We pledge to the country through you the acceptance of such a program by the great body of representative associations and individual manufacturers we are authorized to represent. We do not seek to be regarded as the exclusive spokesman of all industry, and will cooperate in any helpful capacity with any and every manufacturer whether members of our association or not.

6. To secure in the public interest a mutual understanding and agreement predicated upon the proposals set forth, we suggest: That the Council of National Defense call, at the earliest convenient date, a conference of representative national and international officers of American trade-unions, that they may be requested to join in the pledge here made on behalf of employers. Their loyal cooperation for the duration of the war will assure a known standard of conduct to govern these vital industrial relations. The national safety will then no longer be imperiled by disputes, halting vital production and necessarily operating to give aid and assistance to the public enemy.

We reiterate in conclusion the pressing necessity for recognizing one vital and primary principle. A Government which can not itself discriminate between its citizens can not tolerate a condition which encourages private organizations to compel such discrimination. Politically and economically such a policy spells disaster. It destroys the responsibility of management which is vital to successful production and denies in our own democracy the basic principles of individual liberty and opportunity, for which its citizens since the foundation of the Republic have shed freely of their blood and for which to-day they are prepared to die on alien soil

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 940) to provide for the payment for certain lands within the former Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 194) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution (S. J. Res. 104) authorizing the assistant to the Secretary of the Interior to sign official papers and documents, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 193) thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7697) to authorize the calling into the service of the United States the militia and other locally created armed forces in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 195) thereon.

THE "GARABED" INVENTION.

Mr. JAMES. From the Committee on Patents I report back favorably with certain amendments House joint resolution 174. It is a unanimous report of the committee, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky reports from the Committee on Patents the following joint resolution.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 174) for the purpose of promoting efficiency, for the utilization of the resources and industries of the United States, for lessening the expenses of the war, and restoring the loss caused by the war by providing for the employment of a discovery or invention called the "Garabed," claiming to make possible the utilization of free energy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a moment. I wish to ask the Senator reporting the joint resolution if there are amendments made to it protecting the interests of any other inventor who may invent something along the same line, but not to interfere with this particular process.

Mr. JAMES. The amendments by the committee declare that Mr. Giragossian is the first and original inventor or discoverer of this process. I will state to the Senator that I think it gives every protection possible. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] drew the amendments and they were accepted by the committee and unanimously ordered to be reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 6, before the word "discovery," to strike out the article "a" and insert "his"; in section 2, page 2, line 6, after the word "invention," to insert the words "and that it can substantially effect the purposes set out in section 1 of this resolution"; in section 3, page 2, line 14, after the word "invention," to insert the words "and that it can substantially effect the purposes set out in section 1 of this resolution"; in line 14, before the word "original," to insert the words "first and"; on the same page, line 15, after the word "thereof" and the comma to insert "and if the Secretary of the Interior accepts the assignment of the use of said invention as provided in the first section hereof"; on the same page, line 21, after the word "practicable" and the comma, to insert the words "as aforesaid"; and in section 6, page 4, line 14, after the word "use," to insert the words "and ownership," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to accept, as trustee for the United States Government, from Garabed T. K. Giragossian an assignment of the right to utilize for the Government's own use his discovery or invention to be known as the "Garabed." Said assignment to and utilization of said discovery or invention by the United States Government shall be free of charge or expense.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to perform any and all acts, and to make such rules and regulations, and enter into such contracts as may be necessary to carry this resolution into effect: Provided, however, That the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian shall demonstrate the practicability of his discovery or invention and that it can substantially effect the purposes set out in section 1 of this resolution, to a commission of five eminent scientists, who shall be appointed by the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian and be approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The United States Government shall be under no expense in connection with the demonstration of the "Garabed."

SEC. 3. That if such demonstration shall in the opinion of the said scientists prove the practicability of said discovery or invention and that it can substantially effect the purposes set out in section 1 of this resolution, and that he is the first and original discoverer or inventor thereof, and if the Secretary of the Interior accepts the assignment of the use of said invention as provided in the first section hereof, the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian shall be recognized by the United States Government as the original discoverer, inventor, and legal owner of the invention or discovery and of any improvements pertaining thereto that may be made by the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian. The certificate of said commission of scientists, to the effect that said discovery or invention is practicable, as aforesaid, and that he is the original discoverer or inventor thereof, shall constitute the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian the legal owner of and entitle him to all the rights and benefits of said discovery or invention for a period of 17 years. The right is reserved to the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian, his heirs and assigns, to take out patents for his aforesaid discovery, invention, or for any improvement or device pertaining thereto.

SEC. 4. That the United States Government shall not issue to anyone else any patent involving or relating to the distinctive principle of the "Garabed" free energy generator regardless of its form or shape, or for any device, improvement, process, equipment, or apparatus based upon the distinctive principle of the said discovery or invention, or for any improvement or change developed in the use of the said "Garabed," and shall prevent the construction, importation, use, or exploitation thereof, in whole or in part, in the United States, and shall protect the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian, his heirs and assigns, in the rights and interests in the "Garabed" in the above respect for a period of 17 years in the United States and in foreign countries where such protection is afforded by treaty obligation, international law, or diplomatic representation.

SEC. 5. That any essential improvement or contrivance by any person or persons other than Garabed T. K. Giragossian relating to the "Garabed," or its principle, which shall prove valuable and essential thereto in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior during the period of the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian's special protection shall be bought by the United States Government for its own use in conjunction with its use of the said "Garabed," with adequate compensation to the inventor or contriver thereof. If, however, the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian wishes to utilize any such invention or contrivance so acquired by the United States Government, he or his assigns, and no other person or corporation, shall be entitled thereto upon the payment of a fair, just, and reasonable royalty therefor. In consideration of this right the United States Government shall have, without expense, the right to use for its own purpose any new improvement or device made by the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian.

SEC. 6. That after the successful demonstration of the "Garabed," if the United States Government wishes to purchase the right and title for the exclusive use and ownership of said discovery or invention, the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian will comply with the request of the United States Government: Provided, That he shall be remunerated to the extent commensurate with the value of his discovery or invention, which shall be appraised by a committee of even number, one-half of the membership of which shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior and one-half selected by the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian, and the finding of said committee shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and of the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian.

If the United States Congress in session at the time of the demonstration, or at the latest during the following session, does not decide to avail itself of this privilege, the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian's legal rights and powers shall continue unimpaired as prescribed and set forth in this resolution.

SEC. 7. That any sale, or attempted sale, by the said Garabed T. K. Giragossian, or by his representatives or assigns, of any interest in or any title to said discovery or invention, or any part thereof, prior to the approval of the same by said commission of scientists, shall be illegal, invalid, and void.

SEC. 8. That the United States Government will have the right to exercise the aforesaid right to utilize said discovery or invention for its own use simultaneously with the beginning of the public and general use of the said "Garabed" system.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have the resolution, with the amendments agreed to by the Senate, incorporated in the resolution, printed in the RECORD, so that it will appear in the RECORD as it would read if the House should agree to the amendments of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will appear in the RECORD as it would read if amended. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

The joint resolution was passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CULBERSON:

A bill (S. 3522) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 3523) to amend an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. JAMES:

A bill (S. 3524) to amend the act entitled "An act to extend temporarily the time for filing applications and fees and taking action in the United States Patent Office in favor of nations granting reciprocal rights to United States citizens," approved August 17, 1916; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 3525) to create a Legislative Drafting Bureau and to establish a legislative reference division of the Library of Congress; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 3526) to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916 (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 3527) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army for loss of private property destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1885 (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3528) to suspend for the period of the present emergency sections 45, 46, and 56 of an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 3529) to repeal the act entitled "An act to incorporate the National German-American Alliance," approved February 25, 1907.

Mr. KING. I think the bill should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. As I understand, the charter granted to this organization was reported by the Judiciary Committee, although I may be in error. It may have been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 3530) to repeal the act approved March 1, 1913, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, by providing for a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject thereto and securing information concerning their stocks, bonds, and other securities"; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

A bill (S. 3531) for the relief of Franklin A. Swenson; and

A bill (S. 3532) for the relief of Frank Harrigan; to the Committee on Claims.

NAVAL OIL SUPPLY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The second reading of a bill.

The bill (S. 3521) to further provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States with respect to the production, use, and conservation of oil and gas in naval petroleum reserves, and for other purposes, was read the second time by its title.

Mr. SWANSON. I move to refer the bill to the Naval Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. As a substitute for that, I move that the bill be referred to the Public Lands Committee.

Mr. SWANSON. The rule is that we can not substitute one committee for another.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. The rule is that you can not substitute. After a vote on this question, if it is voted down, then motion may be made to refer the bill to some other committee.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I suppose the motion is debatable, and I wish to say a few words on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair assumed a prerogative yesterday which the Chair did not possess. The motion is debatable, and Senators can take all day upon it, or until 2 o'clock.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think the bill as a measure of right and justice under the rules of the Senate should go to the Committee on Public Lands. It has been an unbroken and immemorial practice to refer all measures relating to the disposition, regulation, or control of the public domain of the country, and all legislation in any way affecting the public domain of the country, to the Senate Committee on Public Lands. There have been some very sharp conflicts in this body in times past over the jurisdiction of that committee, and it has been the decision of the Senate in every case to refer all such measures to the Committee on Public Lands. There have been some contests waged along that line where the line of demarcation of jurisdiction was not nearly so clearly marked as it is in the case of this bill, but in every instance the Senate has decided in favor of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Lands.

Personally I am not anxious to have the committee of which I have the honor of being chairman handle great matters of legislation, nor am I greedy for the handling of bills. Personally I care but little or nothing about those matters, but I believe that the right of jurisdiction and the dignity of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman should be protected in this body, and I do not believe it would be right or just or in accordance with the precedent set by the Senate nor the rules of the body to refer a bill of such great importance, which plainly affects in a very vital way the public domain of the country, to any other committee than the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator a question or two—probably one will be sufficient—to get a clear understanding of the matter before us as influencing my own action when I come to vote. I have heard the remarks made by different Senators about the jurisdiction of the committees. I agree in the main with most of what has been said on both sides of the controversy; that is, I agree to this extent, that the jurisdiction prescribed by the rules should be observed. I will state the particular question presented to me. I am told by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and perhaps others, that certain sections of the public lands were carved out of the public domain and donated to, turned over to, given to, public uses which concern the Navy alone; in other words, given over to the Navy. Where is that tract of land, exactly?

Mr. MYERS. I know of no such tract of land about which there was any legislation at all. Large tracts of land have been withdrawn from entry—from mineral entry, homestead entry, desert-land entry, or any other kind of entry—but they are still nevertheless public domain. The United States Government is the owner of those tracts of land.

Mr. STONE. The Senator does know where the lands in question are located?

Mr. MYERS. In the State of California and in the State of Wyoming.

Mr. STONE. So I understand; in the State of California and in Wyoming. Now, I should like to ask the Senator to explain, that I may know, what would be the real difference between the Government of the United States buying a given area of land and acquiring it in private ownership for the use of the Navy? No matter whether it is a wise thing to do, assuming it to have been done, what would be the difference between that and the Government taking a certain tract of land out of the public domain and devoting it exclusively to naval uses?

Mr. MYERS. There would probably be no difference.

Mr. STONE. It seems to me that that is the question presented to us here, as I have listened to the argument.

Mr. MYERS. There would probably be no difference. That can only be done by legislation, and I know of no legislation which has set aside any part of the public domain for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy. If there is any such legislation, I do not know of it.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, acting under the Pickett Act, in 1912, the President set aside this land for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy, using that expression. This bill only affects that land.

Mr. MYERS. The President can not divest the United States of the title to the land.

Mr. SWANSON. The thing the President did was with governmental land. A navy yard is on governmental land. It is not public land, because it is not subject to public entry. Does the Senator contend that a navy yard is subject to the jurisdiction of the Public Lands Committee?

Mr. MYERS. No; I would not claim that, because it is not and never was public domain; but this land in California and in Wyoming always has been and is public land which belongs to the public domain.

Mr. SWANSON. The navy yard at Puget Sound was once public land subject to entry and was set aside. Does the Senator contend that legislation affecting the navy yard at Puget Sound can go to the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. MYERS. Legislation by Congress has made that land belong to the Navy, but there has never been any legislation by Congress making this land in California and Wyoming belong to the Navy.

Mr. STONE. That is the very question I had in mind.

Mr. SWANSON. The Pickett Act confirmed and authorized what had been done and the President by the proclamation of 1912, which I can read to the Senator, said that these lands should be set aside for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from Virginia insist that the President of the United States by any power that he has, or by any that he may usurp, may carve out a part of the public domain, and in virtue of the Pickett Act set it apart for any purpose and transfer title?

Mr. SWANSON. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided in passing upon the Pickett Act that the President of the United States, when authorized to do so as he was by the Pickett Act, has a right to set apart the Federal reserves for the use of the Navy, and he did so.

Mr. MYERS. The President withdrew those lands from public entry, but title has never been divested from the United States and no power can do that except Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. If the title goes to the Navy it is not divested from the United States.

Mr. MYERS. There has never been any legislation which would make that land other than what it always was—public domain; and the President of the United States has not the power to make it otherwise.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Pickett Act specifically authorized temporary withdrawals. That is what all the withdrawals under the Pickett Act are—temporary withdrawals. The word "temporary" is used in the act.

Mr. STONE. For what purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. For the purpose that thereafter, if Congress wants to legislate affecting the land withdrawn, Congress may do so. To now legislate upon the withdrawn area means that this bill should go to the Public Lands Committee instead of to the Naval Committee.

Not only that, but I want the Senate to distinctly understand that the statement that there are no public lands involved in the bill can not be sustained. I ask Senators to read section 4 of the bill, which refers to lands that are claimed by location by individuals in the United States. No title has yet passed, and they are public lands. Again, the Government is questioning titles that have already passed. The bill provides that in cases where it is finally decided the title should pass to the claimants an exchange for lands outside of the exterior boundaries of the withdrawal lands can be made. If that is not dealing with public lands, I do not know what can be dealing with them.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think the statement of the matter which has been made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is very clear and is very correct.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But, Mr. President, does not the bill also deal with lands set apart for the Navy; and does not section 4 simply provide that as to lands set apart for the Navy, where claimants are upon them, can be so handled as to adjust the claimants' rights by letting them take something outside? Therefore, does not that section apply to the responsibility of the Committee on Naval Affairs as well as of the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. MYERS. Who sets them apart for the benefit of the Navy?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The President of the United States, in pursuance of law.

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator from Georgia claim that the President of the United States can set lands aside for the use of the Navy without legislation by Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but the legislation authorized it.

Mr. MYERS. It only authorized a temporary withdrawal, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has said, subject to the disposition by Congress.

Mr. STONE. Well, has the President of the United States attempted to segregate and set aside the particular lands in question exclusively for naval uses?

Mr. MYERS. That is immaterial. He had no power to do that.

Mr. STONE. I am asking for the facts, and not as to the materiality of them.

Mr. MYERS. His order attempted to do that; yes.

Mr. STONE. What President did that?

Mr. THOMAS. Two of them.

Mr. SMOOT. President Taft——

Mr. STONE. President Taft did that?

Mr. SMOOT. President Wilson also did it.

Mr. STONE. It is immaterial what President did it; I merely wanted to get the date when that was done more than the name of the President who did it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there have been temporary withdrawals for this purpose just the same as there have been as to forest reserves. Such withdrawals are made permanent only by further legislation by Congress. Does the Senator from Virginia say that the forest lands to-day are not public lands because they are withdrawn? Mr. President, it is absurd.

Mr. KING. The withdrawal operates.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only that, but the forest lands are withdrawn by direct authorization of Congress, the act giving the President the power to withdraw lands for forest purposes, while the lands withdrawn under the Pickett Act are only temporary withdrawals.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will yield—and it is with his consent I am turning now to interrogate the Senator from Utah—I desire to ask exactly what is meant by the term "temporary withdrawals"? President Taft, the Senator says, did temporarily withdraw these particular lands in question for naval uses. What does that mean, and what were the naval uses for which President Taft withdrew the lands? I ask that question in order to determine in my own mind whether the withdrawal was in fact to be a permanent thing or a temporary thing, so far as the President was concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Montana bear with me further?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to answer the question which the Senator from Missouri has just propounded.

When the Pickett bill was first considered in the House we had a similar bill under consideration in the Public Lands Committee of the Senate. The House passed its bill before the Senate passed the Senate bill. The House bill came to the Senate, and it was reported to the Senate instead of the Senate bill.

Mr. STONE. What importance has that?

Mr. SMOOT. I am giving the history of the matter. In the original bill the word "temporary" was not used, but in the House and in the Senate the word "temporary" was inserted in the bill, and all of the discussion upon the floor of the Senate went to the effect that it was absolutely necessary that the word "temporary" be inserted in the bill because of the fact that the legislation was simply for the purpose of withdrawing whatever lands the President of the United States thought was necessary to withdraw when considered as being required by the Government, but that the withdrawal is temporary is undenied. It was thought Congress would pass within a reasonable time legislation disposing of such withdrawn lands or should return them to the public domain. That is the history, I will say to the Senator, of the insertion of the word "temporary" in the Pickett Act. I know the character of the hearings before the committee and the recommendations which were made by those who were interested in the legislation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is utterly mistaken in his position. The Supreme Court of the United States has expressly decided these questions in the case of the United States against The Midwest Oil Co., in Two hundred and thirty-sixth United States Reports. Let me read a paragraph from the syllabus of the opinion, as follows:

> There is no distinction in the principle between the power of the Executive to make reservations of portions of the public domain and the power to withdraw them from occupation.

Now, what are the facts? I want to show to the Committee on Public Lands how they have attempted by legislation to nullify the act of the Executive.

Mr. SMOOT. In what respect?

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will be patient, I will point that out to him. In 1909, at the instance of the Geological Survey, owing to the fact that a number of men were occupying and seizing oil lands in California and other States, the Executive issued an order withdrawing those lands from location and entry. The men who were trying to capture those public lands paid no attention to the order, but disregarded it and said it was illegal.

In 1910 legislation in regard to the question came before Congress, an intimation having been made that the President had no right to issue such withdrawal order; that it was not within the scope of his authority to do so. So a bill was introduced in Congress to clear up the situation. The bill giving the President the power of withdrawal passed the House and came over to the Senate. That bill came before the Committee on Public Lands, and a majority of that committee made a report, stating that the President from the very beginning of our land system had the power and the right to withdraw public lands from settlement and set them apart either for military or other reservations. In the face of that order of withdrawal, and in the face of the report of the committee, the men seeking the land went to work and filed claims on the lands which had been withdrawn.

Finally, growing out of the matter, a case went to the Supreme Court, the case I have already cited, and the Supreme Court decided that the President of the United States had always possessed the right of withdrawing the public lands and creating reservations. In that decision a multitude of cases were referred to, as was the report made by the Public Lands Committee in February, 1910, and the views expressed by the committee in that report were concurred in by the Supreme Court of the United States.

What has been done by the legislation which has been recently passed by Congress? It has attempted to nullify that withdrawal order. Let me read section 16 of Senate bill 2812, passed by the Senate last week. Unfortunately, I was laid up by an accident, for otherwise I should have been present and discussed it. Section 16 of that bill reads:

SEC. 16. That upon relinquishment to the United States within 90 days from the date of this act or within 90 days after final denial or withdrawal of application for patent, by a claimant of any claim or subdivision thereof—

Now, listen to this—asserted under the mining laws prior to July 3, 1910—

That carries it a year past the President's order of withdrawal—to any unpatented oil or gas lands included in any order of withdrawal and who prior to such date had performed all acts necessary to a valid mining location thereof—

I will not read further from the bill, but I have read enough to show that it gives the men who, in the face of the order of the President and in utter disregard of it, filed on these public lands, a prior right to lease them. Now, does not the Senator from Utah see the situation? These men had bid defiance to the order of the President; they went on those lands and are on them yet, and the bill to which I have referred proposes to give law violators a priority of right to lease these lands. That is all there is in the section of the bill from which I have quoted, and the Senator from Utah ought to know it.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. And will the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] yield?

Mr. MYERS. I will.

Mr. SMOOT. All that the Senator has said has nothing to do with the subject before the Senate or what I have stated. Mr. President, the withdrawal order of President Taft of July 3, 1910——

Mr. NELSON. Nineteen hundred and nine.

Mr. SMOOT. Nineteen hundred and nine, was the first withdrawal order, but the order of 1909 is not mentioned in the bill of the Senator from Virginia, the reference of which is under discussion. I will say to the Senator that the withdrawal order was made in July, 1910, after the passage of the Pickett Act, because President Taft himself expressed the opinion that all withdrawals of oil lands in the United States made before the passage of the Pickett Act, in his opinion, were doubtful.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the Senator, with all due respect, if he will yield to me, is mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. The President did not say that he doubted it, but he said that it was questioned by others, and it was to remove that doubt that the Pickett Act was passed. President Taft was too good a lawyer to say that he himself doubted it; he merely said it was questioned by others.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not particularly care how often the Senator from Minnesota may say I am mistaken, but I am not mistaken, for President Taft himself told me he had doubts on the question. There is no need of discussing the question, however, as to whether President Taft's opinion was right or whether it was wrong; the administration at that time wanted the Pickett Act passed, and it was passed, and in that act were written the words "temporary withdrawal."

As to section 16 of the bill referred to by the Senator from Minnesota, which passed the Senate last week, and injected into this discussion, I understand was a bill drawn by the department. I will say further that I did not vote for that bill, but voted against it.

Mr. NELSON. Well, that is to the Senator's credit.

Mr. SMOOT. The only question before the Senate is whether the bill introduced by the Senator from Virginia dealing with public lands should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs or to the Committee on Public Lands. The bill recognizes the locations that were made before the withdrawal order of July, 1910, and it provides for the exchange and payment for such lands, in case an investigation shows that the locations were made properly and the locators have complied with the law that they can even exchange such lands within the exterior boundaries of the withdrawal for lands within the public domain.

I am not discussing the wisdom of the provisions of the bill because I am in favor of the legislation, and if it should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands I would vote for it. But what I am discussing is the question of referring to the Committee on Naval Affairs a bill that deals with public lands. It is not right, in my opinion, that such a measure should be referred to the Naval Committee. I believe it should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MYERS and Mr. SWANSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Montana surrendered the floor?

Mr. MYERS. I had not intended to do so. I wanted to make a few additional remarks, and I merely sat down to rest a little while the floor was being occupied in my time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds, I wish to propound a parliamentary question. I wish the Chair would state whether or not a mere motion to refer a bill or resolution to a committee is subject to unlimited debate during the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that the Vice President, at the time of the commencement of the discussion with relation to this matter, made the following statement before he called the present occupant to the chair:

The Chair assumed a prerogative yesterday which the Chair did not possess. The motion is debatable, and Senators can take all day upon it, or until 2 o'clock.

Mr. McCUMBER. That means the debate is unlimited until 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under subdivision 3 of Rule XIV is the following:

No bill or joint resolution shall be committed or amended until it shall have been twice read, after which it may be referred to a committee; bills and joint resolutions introduced on leave, and bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives, shall be read once, and may be read twice, on the same day, if not objected to, for reference, but shall not be considered on that day as in Committee of the Whole, nor debated, except for reference, unless by unanimous consent.

The rule says "nor debated, except for reference"; and there is no limitation on that, it seems.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point I am trying to make, Mr. President, is that the general rule relative to debate not exceeding five minutes applies until 1 o'clock under our rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is under our Rule VIII, after the conclusion of the morning business.

Mr. SMOOT. And when the bill is on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; and when it is on the calendar.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, if this debate is to go on without limit, I shall insist upon the other rule, namely, that no Senator shall speak more than twice on the same day and upon the same subject.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from North Dakota gave notice that he would make a speech to-day, and if he prefers speaking now I will consent to this matter going over until to-morrow. I would not let this matter interfere with the speech he desires to make to-day; and if he wishes to speak now, with the consent of the other Senators, I will let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right. That is satisfactory.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think the point of order made by the Senator from North Dakota really was in substance that he desired to make a speech. I am perfectly willing to yield for that purpose and let the matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator gave notice that he desired to make a speech, and I would not interfere with it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, these notices have been given ever since I have been in the Senate, and I think very properly given, that those Senators who desire to absent themselves may have the opportunity, and others who have business and desire to attend to it may do so. I think the practice is very valuable for another reason—that we may know how to accommodate our business to the time that is at our disposal. While it is immaterial to me whether I go on now or an hour later, I understand that a great many Senators desire to attend the funeral this afternoon, and I should be gratified if I may be allowed to proceed at this time.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask that the motion go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the further consideration of this motion to refer will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that the morning business has not been closed, and I do not wish to take the time of the Senate until it is closed.

PEACE BASES.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, on August 15, 1917, I submitted a resolution, which is on the Table Calendar, and known as Senate resolution 115. I ask that it be indefinitely postponed. The resolution is already covered in other matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks for the indefinite postponement of Senate resolution 115. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is postponed indefinitely.

STANDARDIZATION OF WAGES.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from North Dakota to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. On the 4th day of January I submitted a resolution, being Senate resolution 174, directing the Committee on Education and Labor to inquire into the subject of wages having to do directly or indirectly with Government work, etc. The resolution is on the table. I ask that it be taken from the table and now taken up for consideration.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I request the Senator from Utah to allow the resolution to remain on the table until to-morrow. When this resolution is taken up I desire to address some remarks to the Senate on the general subject of politics in the war and other cognate questions related more or less to the resolutions of investigation which have been showered on the Senate. I expect in the course of my remarks to make some pointed, but, I need hardly say, not offensive, remarks in which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] will be personally interested; and as he is not here to-day I should like to give notice of my purpose, expressing the hope that on to-morrow the Senator from Pennsylvania may find it convenient to honor me with his presence.

Mr. KING. I shall be very glad to accede to the request of the Senator from Missouri, and ask that the resolution lie on the table to be considered to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table for the present.

TRAINED NURSES FOR ARMY.

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 185), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Military Affairs be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate and report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the available number of trained nurses for service with the United States Army; and whether or not this present available number will be adequate for the needs of the Army when increased by the anticipated future increments, taking into consideration the increased demand when the Army shall more largely engage in active conflict; and to investigate and report on the advisability of at once establishing training courses or schools for nurses for future service with the Army hospitals; and to investigate and report what, if any, provisions have been made to this end by the War Department.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL PAGES.

Mr. OVERMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 184), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to employ three additional pages for the Senate Chamber at $2.75 per day each for a period lasting until the end of the present session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 12th instant, approved and signed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 106) extending until January 1, 1919, the effective date of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

THE SHIPPING SITUATION.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, yesterday I gave notice that I would to-day discuss the present shipping situation and other matters pertinent to the present condition of the war in Europe. I shall be careful not to give any facts that have not been already made absolutely public, but I shall attempt to present figures and statistics that I think will be interesting and useful to the Senate in the future consideration of the duties which we shall be called upon to perform.

Mr. President, as we stand at the threshold of a new year, ready to shoulder every burden which a battle-torn and distracted world has thrust upon us, no matter of merely domestic concern should be allowed to hold a position of precedence over our important war duties. The pending question should at all times be the question of war.

Actuated by this conviction, it is my purpose here and now to develop and place upon the records of this body such a definite picture of the actual war situation of to-day as will enable us to clearly see and fully comprehend the duties which we have undertaken and with the hope that so seeing and comprehending we shall make our performance square with our colossal task.

Mr. President, the year 1918 opens on a world shrouded in darkness, lighted only by the fires of death. But horrible as is this gloom, great beyond words of expression as are the sufferings and agonies of nations, they are insignificant as compared with the blacker shadow of an impending military autocracy which threatens to rivet its accursed manacles on a world made slave to the brutal lusts of the god of war. Might, armored with dishonor, sustained by intrigue and weaponed with every hell-devised instrumentality which an intellect trained only in the school of murder could conceive, rides in triumph over the weaker and unprepared nations of Europe.

It is most proper that we, whose resources alone can by any possibility shield the world from military slavery, that we who alone have the latent power to save those ideals toward which the whole human race with slow, plodding, and weary steps have labored for centuries, should awaken at the beginning of this new year to a full realization of the magnitude of the task which destiny has assigned to us; and, thus realizing, that we should make our New Year's resolution conform in spirit, intensity, and devotion to the full measure of our sacred obligation.

I am well aware, Mr. President, that there are those who labor under the mistaken theory that to take account of our own weakness in any line or to publicly admit the strength or advantage of the enemy discourages our own people and encourages our foes; and so they advocate a course of suppression. Possibly there are people who will be thus affected, but unless the American people have woefully deteriorated since our last real conflict they certainly can not be so classified. From a military standpoint we as a people may be slow, but we have never failed to measure up to our full capacity when we knew what we must do; and, Mr. President, the sooner we now know and the sooner we gird ourselves for the realities of this war the better it will be for the country.

The first step toward the goal of victory is to undeceive ourselves. Looking at our enemy through the reverse end of the telescope as we have been doing is worse than folly. It creates an unwarranted assurance and invites disaster. We have heretofore talked too much of our invincibility and have done too little to demonstrate it. We have overcultivated our conceit and undercultivated our striking strength. Some one has truly said that "conceit may puff a man up, but it can never prop him up." Shakespeare speaks of boasting as a "killing tongue, but a quiet sword." I commend those words of wisdom to a certain gentleman who some months ago sent out to the American people the picture of a mighty sea battle between our convoy ships and a squadron of submarines—a picture so gory in its colorings that the column of water shot a hundred feet skyward by a bursting shell was red with the blood of our enemies and the dark waves encarmined as though kissed by a crimson sunset. I need not commend them to that British admiral who, at the beginning of the war, declared that the German Navy and the German submarine would be forced like rats out of their holes. He has since learned his lesson; and his country, with that stern silence which always presages real power, is now giving to the world the old traditional spirit of the days of Crecy, of Blenheim, of Trafalgar, of Waterloo, and of Balaklava. Bluster and decision never have reigned and never can reign joint sovereigns of the mental throne. If decision shall now govern, bluster must now abdicate. The great military leaders of the world were equally renowned for their modesty. Grant never boasted; Lincoln hated a braggart.

Mr. President, from the very beginning of this war the press of the country has underestimated the striking power of the central nations and overestimated the strength and resources of the entente powers. The press of the country has assumed, and the people have fallen into the trap, that the central nations were weaker in man power than the forces against them, and that when we entered into the contest our vast resources and weight of numbers would quickly decide the conflict. Of course, those who have taken the trouble to make careful and accurate comparisons have known better. We must now learn the lesson that boasting will not win this war. Collecting money by the billions and spending it in wildest extravagance will not win the war. I am not condemning a proper optimistic spirit on the part of the people. But optimism is a virtue only when harnessed with energy and guided by an intelligent purpose. A blind complacency that fails to recognize great danger is a vice little less than active criminality. The present situation demands action and quick action.

Mr. President, in order to fully understand just what we must meet in this war, I wish to survey briefly the present situation where the battle is raging. What is the relative strength of the countries engaged along that battle front? I get tired of hearing people say that Germany can not win with the world against her. Such statements show a dense ignorance of real proportions. The world is not against the central powers, and the greater part of the world can not even get within striking distance of her. Instead of the world being against Germany on the battle line, she and her allies are vastly superior in territory, in population, and in resources, while their geographical situation gives them a thousand advantages over their opponents. At the beginning of this year, 1918, this country should awaken to that truth.

Mr. President, as no statistical data can so impress the mind as a visual image of proportion, I have prepared a map showing the territory constituting the central powers, the territory actually occupied by these powers and furnishing them the substance which they do not themselves produce. [Indicating map on wall.] The heavy blue line encircles not only the central powers engaged in this war but also includes the conquered territory of opposing countries giving all of their substance to the support of those central powers.

I have not been able to carry the blue line over that portion of Asia which is now held by the Turks. We know that we would have to press that line eastward and southward through Mesopotamia and on to the British line, and the map is not large enough for that purpose. Here we have—

Germany proper, with an area in square miles of	208,780
Austria-Hungary, including Bosnia and Herzegovina	260,034
Bulgaria	43,000
Turkey	710,000
A total of	1,221,814

That comprises the original boundaries of the central powers. But in addition to this the central powers are in actual possession of and utilizing all the resources of—

Belgium, with an area in square miles of	11,302
Serbia	34,000
Roumania, about	39,000
Russian Poland and other Russian territory, now about	150,000
Northern France	7,595
Montenegro	5,330
Albania	7,800
Making a total enemy country in her possession, in square miles, of about	255,027

Or greater than the entire German Empire. This makes a grand total of territory furnishing its resources for the central powers of 1,476,841 square miles.

Against this mighty empire we have in Europe—

Great Britain, including Ireland, square miles	121,331
France	207,054
Italy	110,623
Or a total of	439,008

Deducting therefrom the square miles of France now held by Germany of 7,595, we have left a total of 431,413.

In actual territorial domain, therefore, the central powers exceed the entente powers by nearly 3 to 1 and in actual territory possessed by them, over which they are exercising complete sovereignty and which is furnishing them with all its valuable resources, the central powers exceed the entente powers by more than 3½ to 1.

Not only this, Mr. President, but the territory occupied by the central powers in productivity and in all that sustains modern life and adds to effectiveness in war is enormously superior, acre for acre, to that of the entente powers. Bulgaria has always produced a surplus of agricultural products. Austria-Hungary has always produced more agricultural products than she has consumed.

These central countries are in possession of all the important oil fields, of all the important coal fields, of all the important iron fields of continental Europe. With intensified farming, supplemented by reasonable economy, this section of Europe is unquestionably self-supporting in food products. The coming spring will undoubtedly see the vast fields of Russia promising a bounteous harvest for the German armies and civilian population.

Is it not about time that we stop our talk about the collapse of the central powers for lack of food? The truth is the central powers are better supplied with food than any other European belligerent power. Great Britain is suffering far more than any other country, is complaining less, and, for the most part, fighting harder.

Passing from the subject of physical resources and territorial domain, I want Senators now to again approach the fighting line and take accurate measurement of the man power of each nation engaged in that conflict. Here we have—

Germany, with a population in round numbers of	70,000,000
Austria-Hungary	50,000,000
Bulgaria	5,000,000
Turkey	21,000,000
Or a total population of	146,000,000

Pitted against these we have—

Great Britain and Ireland, with a population of	45,000,000
France (about)	40,000,000
Italy	35,000,000
Or a total of	120,000,000

I have not included Belgium because the number of Belgian soldiers is a negligible quantity.

If we go to the limit in man power, any first-class nation can put into the ranks one-sixth of its population. On this basis the central powers can put into the field, in round numbers, 24,350,000. The entente powers, at the same ratio, could put into the field 20,000,000. The entente would be outnumbered on the battle line 4,350,000. But you may suggest that I have not considered Canada, Australia, and what may be drawn from India. A very brief glance at the situation, however, will demonstrate that the number of soldiers drawn from these distant countries are more than balanced by the number of men that Great Britain must utilize in other avenues than along the battle front. Remember that Great Britain must furnish the sea service for all of her allies. She must divert a vast number of men who could otherwise be called to the front to man the ships necessary to furnish herself food and clothing and to carry food, clothing, ammunition, and soldiers to her allies. I do not know just how many able men would be required for the service, but probably not less than 500,000.

Great Britain must hold the naval mastery of the ocean, at least the surface of the ocean, and this, including trawlers, chasers, mine sweepers, and so forth, will take, we will say, 500,000 more. This would about equal all of the soldiery which Great Britain can draw from her over-seas domains and leave the proportionate man strength about the same as suggested.

It must also be remembered that Great Britain, in furnishing ammunition and guns and other equipment to her allies, must withdraw from her otherwise fighting forces a vast number of men to produce those things. It should further be remembered that the conscription has not been applied to Ireland.

So it is safe to say that the entente countries, after using all their man power, will necessarily be outnumbered on the field of battle by between four and five million.

Nor is this all. The central powers have the additional advantage of one solid contiguous territory, with both flanks of their battle line resting against inviolate neutral territory. She can not, therefore, be flanked. All the entente powers can hope for is to either protect their line of battle or hold it without advantage to either, and this seems the utmost that can be hoped for until the United States really gets into the conflict, if we ever do get in.

Again, the transportation facilities of the central powers are such as to enable them to throw a preponderating force against any point in a line in a few hours, while it would take days to move a like force from point to point by the entente powers.

And still again, not a foot of the territory of the great central powers has been devastated or is under enemy control. Their industries, untouched by the hand of devastation, and organized as those of no other country in the world, are sending their steady flow of equipment to maintain those vast armies. The entente powers have about reached their limit. It is up to us to supply the deficiency. To just balance the man power of the central nations, this country should send to the front, as I have declared, and I reiterate it again, this country should have at the front to-day at least 5,000,000 soldiers. To equal the geographical advantage of the central powers, this country should have on the battle field at least an additional million. To overcome the advantages of a mere defensive warfare, to be the aggressors—in other words, to force the central powers to retreat—we should furnish at least another million; and as a retreat would shorten the line of the central powers and bring them nearer the axis of the arc, closer to the source of supply, the number of the offensive should be correspondingly increased.

So, Mr. President, we should have in the field at this time at least 7,000,000 men. And that is assuming that the three powers, England, France, and Italy, will all remain in the field.

But, Mr. President, who can say with any degree of certainty that in another six months Italy will still be battling for this world cause? Encouraging as our smile of hope may be, the ugly fact stares us in the face that about 300,000 of that army have surrendered within the last two months. There may be causes for that surrender of which I am ignorant, and I shall not criticize, but I shall not fail to note, in view of the fact, that the surrender was without even a battle, without even a real blow; that there were strong indications of internal disintegration. There are possibilities, Mr. President, even more grave than this which I shall not mention at this time.

But with Italy out and with France flanked, though our burdens would be enormously increased, we would not be beaten in this war. Supply Great Britain with food and clothing and Great Britain and the United States can continue this war for 40 years if necessary. British soldiers and British sailors will fight to the death. In my judgment, they will suffer more and still maintain their tenacity of purpose than any other European people, but no amount of courage or fidelity can resist the weapon of famine. And talk as heroically and as optimistically as we may, the undeniable fact still stares at us that with her undersea craft Germany is taking in unchecked flow the very life-blood of Great Britain in this unequal contest. Great Britain, the one country which is doing greater work and is suffering more than all others, whose financial credit and whose ships are sustaining the life of her allies, is rapidly losing that upon which her own life depends.

If Great Britain were to battle for herself alone, she might defend herself for years, even against this new monster of the sea. But she knows that she is fighting the world's war, that she is battling for a peace that shall be permanent; and she knows, as we all know, that any peace that will leave Continental Europe prostrate before any military autocracy means a renewed war or slavery, and she will never desert her allies, though, like Russia and Roumania, they fall one after the other, either through exhaustion or intrigue, or both, so long as one of them remains at her side.

In my opinion, there is but one power that can overcome her endurance, and that is the power of starvation—a starvation brought about by Germany's only hope, the submarine, which alone can paralyze her arm and destroy her power.

The question, then, presents itself to us, How long can she stand this strain? Russia and Roumania are out of the war. Italy is losing ground. France is unable to make any headway. The wall of opposition at the eastern end of the battle line in continental Europe is crumbling. How long can Italy withstand the Teutonic pressure? Optimistic, indeed, must be the man who would prophesy a single year without additional support. With Italy under the heel of the conqueror, with France assailed in the flank, who can prophesy that that country will not be quickly brought under the heel of the same conqueror, and England's Army left to battle against overwhelming numbers? You may say that this is painting a gloomy picture. This, Mr. President, is delineating two things, first, the exact situation as it now is, and, second, the possibilities of the future; and it is presented with the hope that we will at least partially awaken to a realization of what is before us.

In April of 1917, in an address before the Senate, I declared that this war would be lost or won by the U-boat; that if we were able to meet its ravages, we would win; if we were not able, we would lose. I have not changed in the slightest degree the opinion I then held. Every day has added to my conviction. Every day has seen fewer tons of the world's shipping afloat. Germany declared that if she could sink a million tons of the world's shipping a month she would bring England to her knees in 10 months. Had she been able to do so her hope might possibly have been realized. She has not done all of that, but she has sunk about 8,000,000 tons of the world's shipping in the year 1917, and the destruction goes on without cessation and with little variation in the monthly toll.

The question is not whether these central powers can conquer the United States. Of course they can not conquer us. Our resources are so great and so diversified, our food, clothing, and mineral supplies are so adequate, that we could live in comfort for a century, even though we had not a merchant ship afloat on the ocean, and then we could do just what Germany is now doing to the British shipping—that is, without any shipping of our own to defend—we could turn into the ocean such a hoard of submarines as would close every German port to the outside world until she begged for peace.

I am not failing to observe the strain of this war on the central powers. But they are buoyed up with the courage that comes from the fact that the prowess of Russia has been broken; that Roumania has surrendered; that they have opened the granaries of Russia; and that their U-boats report in undiminished figures the weekly toll of enemy merchant ships.

The question is, Can our allies, and especially Great Britain, stay in the field until we can actually get into this war? Or will those powers be compelled to declare a draw, with nothing settled and begin the preparation for a further and greater slaughter?

And this, Mr. President, brings us right up to the one situation which is so imminent and which so overshadows all others that it is folly to talk about raising armies or saving food supplies until that question is solved, and that is the shipping question. Why talk about sending a million men to Europe when we have not the ships to take care of more than a quarter of a million? Why talk about conserving our food in order to assure a surplus for export when we have not the ships to take one-quarter of that surplus?

Mr. President, our allies informed us the very day of our entry into the struggle that what they most needed was ships; that ships were far more important to them than men; that they must have food and coal and ammunition; that Great Britain had turned over to France 2,000,000 tons of her shipping; that she was supplying her merchant marine to all the other allies, while suffering a devastation many times greater than all put together; that she was losing by the submarine from six to seven million tons per year, while her shipyards in 1916 produced but little over half a million gross tons. They cried for ships, they begged for ships, and more ships. They said to us, "Give us 6,000,000 tons in 1918 and we can possibly withstand the ravages of the submarine." We allayed their fears; we assured them we would supply that shipping. We took that duty upon ourselves, the most important, the most vital duty incumbent upon us in this war. And, Mr. President, we have neglected that duty beyond any other, shamefully neglected it. They tell us it was because of the wrangling and disagreements among the members of the Shipping Board. But had the members of the Shipping Board fully realized what the creation of this tonnage would mean in this war, had they contemplated the disastrous results that would follow their failure I can not believe that any one of them would have been so unpatriotic as to have delayed construction while they were fighting out differences of opinion. I must attribute the delay to a lack of appreciation of the magnitude of the submarine danger. It is between that and unpatriotism only that I must decide.

We appointed a Kilkenny Shipping Board and then we went to sleep, and as this board awakes to the chimes of the new year it says that it hopes to produce of new shipping 2,000,000 gross tons. Was ever a promise more glibly made? Was ever a promise more disgracefully broken?

As one modest Member of this body, I have not slept at my post or failed to hoist the danger signal. I admit that what I may have said upon the subject could not penetrate very far, and especially against the assurance of the Committee on Naval Affairs that there was really nothing serious in the submarine menace. I have tried in a most earnest, though apparently feeble way to awaken the country, the Navy Department, the Shipping Board, and the Committee on Naval Affairs to the dire situation that would certainly confront us unless we directed our energies toward meeting the submarine menace. In February, 1917, in April, in July, and again in August I attempted to present this matter. I prepared tables and statistics to bring the subject matter home to us. I introduced a bill which, had the Committee on Naval Affairs not been misled by the unfounded assurance of the Navy Department, would, in my opinion, have ships afloat to-day that could defy the torpedo. But the answer from this committee, given with smiling serenity, was that my fears were unfounded; that the Navy Department had had the matter under consideration; that it had conceived a plan which would in a few weeks make the submarine menace a matter of no consequence.

I was assured that if I would see the Secretary of the Navy I would be relieved of all concern.

Well, Mr. President, I doubted if the Secretary of the Navy had in contemplation any real method of meeting that menace. So I introduced a resolution calling on him to give to the Senate, if not incompatible with national interests, what steps had been taken and what in view to meet this menace. The following excerpts from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy in response to this resolution are sufficient to demonstrate the spirit of incredulity on the part of the Navy Department in respect to the possibility of protecting merchant vessels against the submarine torpedo.

Contrary to the press reports, there is no single device which has solved the submarine menace; it is considered very unlikely that there ever will be any single device that can accomplish this desirable end. It is a well-known fact that for every offense there is a defense, and for every successful defense there will develop a new type of offense. It therefore appears essential to develop not only one but as many devices as may have sufficient merit to justify their use.

I heartily agree with the Secretary that for every offense there is a defense. But, Mr. President, what we complain of and what every nation whose sons are strangling down to watery graves every day and hour of the year have a right to complain of, is that the effort to find the real defense against the torpedo offense has been too insignificant in comparison with the gravity of that offense. Proposed measures of defense which give the greatest promise have been met with seeming hostility rather than with welcoming demeanor.

The answer proceeds:

The department has placed available for use such vessels as conditions warrant and needs justify for the purpose of conducting the necessary tests. Shore facilities have also been made available as necessary. The representatives of the various boards and councils mentioned above have utilized their own laboratories or laboratories placed at their disposal in order that no effort may be spared to produce the desired results.

Mr. President, it is the duty of the Navy Department on its own account and at its own expense to make reasonable tests. The Navy Department is one of the war arms of this Nation, and as such charged with the duty of developing a defense against this awful destruction of the merchant marine of the world upon which we and our allies must depend in this struggle; and having billions at its disposal for this purpose it has no right to say to the private individual, "We will give you shore facilities and the use of our laboratories. Now, you show us." The individual has not the means to build a ship or a quarter of a ship; you have, and it is up to you to give adequate tests to those proposals which, indorsed by experts on both explosives and ship construction, give fair promise of rendering the torpedo harmless. This war is costing $160,000,000 daily, and you can well afford a little $50,000, the sum asked to give the proposal a fair trial.

Again, says the Secretary:

Senate resolution No. 76 appears to apply primarily to mechanical devices to protect or shield merchant vessels, thereby covering only a limited part of the field. It is believed that the reports in the press of the country, referred to, must have originated with the various inventors, who naturally believe that their ideas are satisfactory.

While numerous inventions and mechanical contrivances for protecting and shielding merchant vessels have been submitted to and considered by the department, none of them are regarded as perfected in the sense of being an adequate and satisfactory contrivance for the purpose and capable of general application to merchant vessels engaged in traffic between ports of the United States and ports of Europe.

The attitude of this department seems to be that if some kindly disposed citizen will beg or borrow enough to demonstrate beyond any possibility of failure and perfect a vessel that can withstand a torpedo attack and still keep afloat, the department will not be averse to giving the matter consideration.

Mr. President, that is not the spirit that should dominate this department in this dire emergency. Its negative attitude should immediately give way to an aggressive attitude. It should not only welcome but search with unswerving energy for any clue or means that would promise a solution of this great and controlling factor of this war.

Mr. President, after repeated efforts to secure information from the Navy Department or the Shipping Board concerning any real program for ship construction and meeting the same spirit of indifference on the part of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I sought to awaken the Senate to the gravity of the situation by a presentation of such statistics as I could then gather covering the destruction of the tonnage of the world, the constructive possibilities of the maritime nations engaged to meet such destruction, and the resulting devastation which, if not met, would spell the doom of those nations which were bearing the whole burden of an unequal war. I then declared as a sequence to that argument that unless we could meet the ravages of the submarine it would destroy our allies before we could get into the conflict. Since then Russia and Roumania have been overcome by force and intrigue. Italy has been rapidly surrendering men and territory. Serbia is prostrate. The power of France has subsided to a defensive attitude only. Britain alone is striking hard and battling to the death, while Fate, with measuring line, is telling off her losses in ships on which the life of her population depends. She dare not even look at the full ugliness of the situation. Her sons in grim desperation fight and die or, with the gloom of the fatalist on their brows, go down to death unable to strike or even see their foes.

We are raising an army of a million men, which we hope to make effective some time. We must convoy them by long, circuitous and zigzag routes, requiring 40 per cent more tonnage than a direct route would demand.

We know we must supply Great Britain and France and Italy. We know we shall require 5,000,000 men in France before we can ever hope to equalize the forces of the powers pitted against each other. Where is our shipping? Where is it coming from? Possibly God knows; certainly neither the Shipping Board nor the Navy Department knows.

What, then, is the real shipping situation of to-day? It is an ugly picture, I admit, but we must look it squarely in the face, and once recognizing its proportions, we shall cease to think or talk about setting afloat a little two or three million tons of shipping in 1918, but, in conjunction with our allies, bend every energy toward the construction of ten times that tonnage.

To properly supply our wants we and our allies would have use for more shipping than the entire world possessed on August 4, 1914. But of course we can not dream of such a realization.

In giving the data which I shall now present, I must follow consistently a single standard for measuring the tonnage capacity of any vessel. When we read of the destruction of a ship of 4,000 tons, we never know with certainty whether the reporter means net tonnage, gross tonnage, or dead-weight tonnage. To make this clear let me define each:

"Dead-weight tonnage" means the maximum of cargo, bunkers, consumable stores, engines, boilers, and all other matter, including passengers and crew.

"Gross tonnage" means the number of units of 100 cubic feet each of the entire cubical capacity of the vessel, including spaces occupied by cabins, boilers, engines, coal bunkers, and so forth.

"Net tonnage" means gross tonnage less the space occupied by all cabins, boilers, engines, coal bunkers, and so forth, and is a trifle over three-fifths of gross tonnage.

When Great Britain speaks of a vessel of a certain tonnage she means gross tonnage. When the United States speaks of producing a certain tonnage of vessels during the war she means dead-weight tonnage.

To reduce dead-weight tonnage to gross tonnage, the term generally used by maritime nations, we must divide dead-weight tonnage by 1.65. Thus 4,000 dead-weight would be only about 2,425 gross tonnage. The data I shall give will be in gross tonnage only.

The Journal of Commerce gives the total tonnage of the world on August 1, 1914, as 48,139,365.

Others give it as high as 51,000,000.

I think we may properly adopt as a fair basis for our computation 49,000,000.

In order to ascertain what tonnage is now afloat we must first deduct from this the tonnage of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Turkey, which in the early stages of the war was either destroyed or driven off the seas and which amounted to about 7,000,000 tons.

This would leave for our allies and all neutrals about 42,000,000 tons.

Destruction since the war began and up to January 1, 1918, will be, by submarine and mine, about 9,500,000 tons; other maritime casualties about 1,275,000 tons; total casualties, 10,775,000 tons; leaving a balance of prewar tonnage still afloat, 31,225,000 tons.

There has been added to this tonnage, constructed since the beginning of the war, by—

	Tons.	Tons.
Great Britain in 1915	668,000
Great Britain, 1916	538,000
Great Britain, 1917, estimated	1,400,000
Total by Great Britain		2,606,000
United States, 1915, ocean-going (we have created something more than this, but I must limit the figures to the ocean-going tonnage)	141,864
United States, 1916, ocean-going	237,836
United States, 1917, ocean-going, about	1,000,000
Total by United States		1,479,700
All other construction		500,000
Total construction allied and neutral shipping		4,585,700

Total construction afloat January 1, 1918, 35,810,700 tons.

The shipping of all the countries, exclusive of the central powers and Turkey, at the beginning of the war was 42,000,000 tons.

Therefore the shipping of our allies, ourselves, and the neutral countries has decreased since 1914 about 6,189,300 tons.

As we can only call upon our own shipping in case of an emergency—and I mean our shipping and our allies' shipping—it may be well to consider the shipping of those countries engaged in war against the central powers independently of other world shipping.

The tonnage of Great Britain at the beginning of the war is given as 19,779,119; say, in round numbers, 20,000,000; France, 2,300,000; Italy, 1,700,000; the United States, 8,000,000; total, 32,000,000 tons.

I have not included Japan, for the reason that she is in this war only in Asia and is using very few ships within the war zone.

The losses of these countries since the war began have been about 9,500,000 tons.

Balance of prewar shipping, 22,500,000 tons; constructed and put afloat by the United States and Great Britain, including all vessels commandeered which are ocean going, about 2,400,000 tons; amount now afloat, 24,900,000 tons.

Loss of the allies, including the United States, since 1914, after making all allowance for new construction, about 7,100,000 tons.

Thus, when we are in need of an enormous increase in shipping facilities to carry on this war we find ourselves at the beginning of 1918 with 7,100,000 tons less than we had in 1914.

But, Mr. President, this comparison does not measure the full deficiency. To keep apace with the growing population and commerce in peace times demands an increased tonnage of about 5 per cent annually. To meet peace requirements these countries should have had, therefore, at the beginning of 1918, 38,400,000 tons.

So, Mr. President, if we had no war on our hands to-day, we and our allies would be short of our combined needs in times of peace 13,500,000 tons.

But, Mr. President, these calculations would be more valuable if we could narrow them down to the available trans-Atlantic tonnage. That is the principal thing. The present emergency calls for ships to be used exclusively between the United States and Canada and Argentina on one side and Europe on the other. In talking of total world tonnage we are liable to deceive ourselves, as this tonnage consists of all kinds of boats and sailing vessels and ships that can not be used for ocean traffic. For instance, while in 1914 the entire tonnage of the United States was about 8,000,000, less than 2,000,000 was engaged in foreign commerce. The lakes, rivers, and coastwise commerce account for most of that tonnage. So, too, less than one-fourth of the tonnage of the world was engaged in trans-Atlantic service prior to the war. And when we recall that nearly all the U-boat victims have been trans-Atlantic ships we begin to realize the tremendous blow at the commerce upon which we must now depend.

On July 23, 1917, the Emergency Fleet Corporation prepared a chart showing that out of the total trans-Atlantic shipping of 10,000,000 tons, the submarine destruction was accounting for 7,500,000 tons per annum, leaving only 2,500,000 of the original tonnage.

This mighty loss has to be made good by diverting all possible tonnage from other routes and by new construction. But, Mr. President, the sources of supply are grossly inadequate to fill the gap.

So, in a nutshell, the situation to-day calls from us in men 5,000,000. To supply these men constantly employed an additional tonnage of 30,000,000 is required; and if we are to keep the commerce of ourselves and our allies up to a normal condition we should require a further construction of 13,500,000; in all, 43,500,000.

We should need that much additional tonnage to be able to throw the maximum strength of our allies and even half of our own maximum strength into this war.

But, coming right down to the unquestionable necessities of the shipping tragedy: We have in Europe to-day, say, 200,000 soldiers. I have shown that before we can make any real headway, before our allies can make any real advance against the increasing numbers of the central powers transported to the western front since the surrender of Russia, we should have not less than 5,000,000 soldiers in France. We should have ships enough to supply those soldiers and keep them supplied with ammunition. Considering the longer passage, the longer period of time consumed in such passage, from the best information I can obtain I am of the opinion that it will require not less than 6 tons per man to transfer these men and equipment of all character, and thereafter to supply losses and keep the number up to that standard it will continually require 6 tons per soldier. That would mean that there must be diverted for Army purposes alone to supply an army of 5,000,000 men 30,000,000 tons. As heretofore shown, we and our allies are now short of normal needs by 13,500,000 tons.

Recognizing the impossibility of our being able to produce the tonnage we should have, we must direct our attention to the minimum amount that we must produce if we have any hope of maintaining the status quo on the firing line until we can get into the war. That minimum amount is problematical, because we do not know how tenaciously the Italian forces may hold out. It is asserted that Italy to sustain her fighting power will need 250,000 tons of wheat each month until the next harvest, besides vast quantities of coal. France is short and is sounding the alarm, and Great Britain is short and must again cut her rations.

Great Britain advised us at the time we entered this conflict that the allies, to maintain their present striking force, must have from this country at the very least 6,000,000 tons of shipping. We must remember that Great Britain has loaned much of her available tonnage to her allies. France, for instance, has 2,000,000 tons of British shipping under her control. In addition to this, Great Britain is supplying the major part of the shipping for all of her allies' requirements.

It is a fair estimate to say that the British and other allies' losses for the year 1917 from all causes was about 8,000,000 tons.

Estimating the losses for 1918 on the basis of the last nine months, which excludes the very heaviest sinkings in the winter of 1917, it is safe to predict that the allies will lose in 1918 at least 7,500,000 tons.

Great Britain can produce in 1918 hardly more than 2,000,000 tons.

That would leave for us to construct to keep even the present tonnage afloat 5,500,000 tons.

But the amount afloat at the present time is not sufficient to take care of the pressing needs of Italy and France, even leaving Great Britain out of the question. There should be at least another five or six million tons for that purpose; in all, say, 11,000,000 tons.

If we attempt to put 1,000,000 men in the field in 1918 it would require 6,000,000 tons additional, or a grand total of 17,000,000 tons.

So, to put ourselves and our allies on a proper war footing, we and they combined should produce 43,500,000 tons of shipping before 1919. To meet the pressing demands and keep the situation in balance, without further loss of territory and possible loss of some of our allies, we must construct in 1918 17,000,000 tons. Can it be done?

Mr. President, it can be done, and I shall proceed to show how it can be done. I do not expect to make any impression upon the departments responsible for the conduct of the war, any more than I was able to make an impression last April when I declared that the question of winning or losing this war was simply a question of overcoming or being overcome by the U boat. I know the awakening process must be through the medium of the press and public opinion, and I must do my bit in this war by helping this process. Heretofore arguments seemed to have been futile. You might as well have tried to persuade a turtle on a railroad track that his inactivity meant destruction. He would have simply drawn his head within his shell with the same optimistic assurance that has characterized our course in reference to this whole submarine menace. Had the Navy Department of the United States been able to get out of its shell of antiquated ideas long enough to have caught a ray of the inspiration of originality, I believe we could already have seen the doom of the U boat. Had the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate been an active power to win the war rather than a passive instrumentality to simply advise and report what the Navy Department in its wisdom or unwisdom had seen fit to suggest, we should have had to-day ships that would have been able to defy the submarine torpedo. But so ossified had become this great department, so conceited in the prowess of dreadnaughts, that it condemned without hearing and as a gross impertinence any suggestion that a ship could be so constructed as to continue afloat after being struck by a torpedo. And while that august department has been literally throwing away millions its auxilliary, the Shipping Board, refused the little sum of $50,000 asked for by the greatest expert on explosives in the United States to test a torpedo-proof hull, and who, with a ship contractor, presented plans and specifications of a ship which he declared would carry its freight across the ocean with the loss of only about 11 per cent of cargo space, submarine or no submarine.

Mr. President, even though the ship, constructed as proposed, should not have proved a success $50,000 would have demonstrated it; and, in view of the mighty promise that, if successful, it would be equivalent to the instantaneous destruction of every U boat afloat and would render harmless every one under construction, assuring victory before the end of another year, was it not worth the trial?

We have prided ourselves upon being the greatest inventive country in the world, and, outside of the deep-rutted and case-hardened Military and Naval Departments, our pride is fully justified. Our opportunities for the utilization of new mechanical inventions have intensified and strengthened the inventive genius of the American people. The greatest instrumentalities of destruction and usefulness in the war to-day are all of American origin. The submarine, the flying machine, the caterpillar truck, the Maxim gun, and many others which might be mentioned, all had their origin in the United States; and, strange to say, every one of them has been tabooed by our War and Navy establishments. And yet this war has demonstrated that it must be fought with new weapons, and the new weapons must be neutralized by new instrumentalities. The whole success of Germany has been due to the fact that, though not the inventor, she has been the leader in the utilization of these new devices. Long before the war began her scientists were developing gases to blind the eyes or burn out the lungs of her opponents, flames to burn away all obstacles to their massed attacks, U boats to strike unseen.

Germany was not afraid to try out any new and original idea. It may be that the Zeppelins have not proved a success, but she had the courage to try them and to try them thoroughly. And she has undoubtedly tried many other things that have not been successful, but out of the many she has brought forth new instrumentalities of destruction that are fast leading her to victory, while our Navy Department and our Shipping Board strain at the little expense of $50,000 to try out the most important suggestion that has ever been made in this war. The department must answer to the indictment of inability to meet a situation. The only answer to that indictment is one either of incompetency or of negligence, and neither is satisfactory. Had this department been competent it must have known long before we entered into this war just what the controlling factor in the conflict would be, namely, the question of meeting the submarine ravages. It knew that little, if anything, could be hoped for in capturing and destroying the submarine. It knew that hunting submarines would be as uncertain as hunting needles in a haystack. And yet almost nothing has been done to meet that situation. In fact, nothing has been suggested by the department other than to build ships as rapidly as the U-boats could sink them. In other words, it proposed to ram ships and cargoes and men down the monster's throat in such numbers as to choke it to death. The only thing that has appealed to this department or the Shipping Board as a defense against the submarine has been the great idea of painting a ship to look like the ocean waves.

Mr. President, the very first step taken in 1918 should be to cease for the present the sending of our soldiers over to Europe and to use every ton of shipping space for food for our allies. The empty caisson can wait, the empty stomach can not wait. The soldier must eat before he can shoot, and if he waits overlong for his food he can never shoot again. Just now our allies need our food a thousand times more than they need our soldiers. The splendid words of our President restating our war aims can not but fill the hearts of all our allies with new courage. I would supplement that with a thousand cargoes of food that this courage may have a foundation to stand on, and the tide of military success will immediately be turned in our favor.

Concurrent with this effort should be steps to immediately demonstrate whether it is possible to construct a vessel that will keep afloat notwithstanding torpedo attack, and if demonstrated then every ship should be so constructed. Germany's entire reliance is in her submarine. Pull the teeth of this monster of the sea and she will make the peace we demand in a month. Building ships and loading them with munitions for torpedo fodder must certainly be most gratifying to Germany herself. One ship that will stay afloat is worth a thousand ships at the bottom of the ocean. If the torpedo is rendered harmless every submarine is thereby instantly destroyed at a single blow. The assurance that such a ship can be constructed, coming from the source it does, demands an immediate test, and the gravity of the situation emphasizes the demand a thousandfold.

The next step is to make a full and adequate test of reinforced concrete ships. I understand that the Government has contracted for one or two of these ships. But what should be done is to put one of them to an immediate test. I do not think we should even make construction wait for that test. I believe that ships of this character have already been tried out in sufficient numbers to demonstrate their utility. As most of the ships proposed to be built are of slow speed, which will require convoy, and as the ability of these concrete ships to stand the stress of ocean storms has already been demonstrated, the pressing exigencies of the shipping situation justify our proceeding immediately to construct a vast fleet of them. If, in the meantime, we find that the one constructed is not a success and can not be made a success we can cease our further efforts along that line. We can afford the loss far better than we can afford the delay. We can proceed with the construction of concrete ships without interfering with the construction of steel and wooden ships. The hulls can be constructed by unskilled labor, which is not the case in the construction of any other character of ship. Concrete can be produced in adequate quantities at any point desired. I have been informed by a single firm of long experience in concrete structures that it can turn out 10,000,000 tons of hulls in 1918. This could easily be increased to 20,000,000. Notwithstanding the fabulous prices paid to all character of skilled workmen, we would have no difficulty in securing the unskilled labor necessary for the construction of this reinforced concrete tonnage.

Mr. President, there appeared in the December number of the North American Review an article written by Col. Harvey, entitled "Are we losing this war?" I shall not comment on the article, which, while it may have had some justification for the ironical criticisms, did not point out any specific line which should be followed to win the war.

The question weighing most heavily on every man who attempts to analyze the actual war situation as we enter the year 1918 is not are we losing the war, but are we liable to lose the kind of a peace proclaimed by the President in his address on the 8th day of January, 1918? Have we been so remiss, so slow in preparing to meet the great emergency that confronted us when we drew the sword that we shall be unable to secure that kind of peace that will assure to all nations immunity from destruction by powerful military neighbors and an opportunity to work out their own industrial and commercial destinies unscared by the spector of military destruction?

I have an abiding hope, based upon the everlasting principle that right will in the end prevail, that we shall not emerge from this war without securing this peace; but I am equally certain that unless we shall come to the support of our allies with shipping facilities many times greater than we propose some of our allies will fall before we can take their place on the battle field and thereby prolong this war, with its hideous slaughter, for many months. Our every thought, our every energy should now be devoted exclusively to these methods of meeting the submarine ravages, to the question of supporting our allies with food and such war material as they can not produce, until the full might and prowess of this country, with the invincible sweep of our armies, shall achieve a victory that will forever free the nations of the world from the tyranny of autocratic militarism and its people from the crushing load of armaments.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 17, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 16, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, increase our confidence and faith in Thee as individuals and as a people; that amid all the changes, disappointments, and sorrows of life we may have that peace which the world can neither give nor take away.

"For they that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which can not be removed, but abideth for ever."

Thus may we be firm in the Lord and increase in all that makes a Nation great; for Thine is the Kingdom, and the Power, and the Glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON WATER POWER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following Committee on Water Power, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SIMS, Mr. FERRIS, Mr. LEVER, Mr. DOREMUS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. LEE of Georgia, Mr STEPHENS of Nebraska, Mr. RAKER, Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. ESCH, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, and Mr. ANDERSON.

The SPEAKER. The committee is made up by taking the six top members of the three committees who were invited to the White House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Maj. Augustus Peabody Gardner, formerly a Member of this Congress and who resigned therefrom to enter the military service of the United States, and whose death occurred at Camp Wheeler, Ga., on Monday, the 14th day of January, 1918.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

SENATE BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3235. An act amending section 32, Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916.

INSURANCE AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT, ETC.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The unfinished business is House joint resolution 189, to provide for a commission to inquire into the advisability of establishing national insurance against unemployment, invalidity, and sickness. The resolution is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 189, with Mr. RUBEY in the chair.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned on Wednesday last we had concluded the general debate on the resolution. I therefore ask for the reading of the resolution for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the Commission on Social Insurance, hereinafter referred to as the commission. The commission shall be composed of five persons, to be appointed by the President of the United States, two of whom shall be employers of labor and two of whom shall be representatives of organized labor, the Secretary of Labor to be the fifth member of the commission and the chairman thereof. It shall be within the power of the Secretary of Labor to select a representative of the Department of Labor to act in his stead in any hearing or investigation in which the Secretary himself may be unable to participate, and said representative shall have full power to act in the name of the Secretary of Labor, but the position of the Secretary of Labor, as the fifth member and as chairman of the commission, shall in no wise be impaired, and in the report, findings, and recommendations of the commission his name and title shall be appended.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the word "That," in line 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "When the present war emergency shall have ended, as evidenced by a proclamation of the President to that effect."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of perfecting this resolution.

With the object of affording all proper legislative relief to men and women who labor I am in the heartiest accord, and I believe the great question of the future to be the proper assembly, distribution, and care of labor, in order that the laboring people and the country in which they labor and its people generally may be mutually benefited.

One does not labor for himself alone. He labors for society, and society should recognize its responsibility to the laborer. So the questions of proper surroundings in labor, of proper safeguards against injury, the care and compensation for the disabled, the invalided, and the aged are very vital questions.

But just at this time there could be no reliable data collected on these great questions which are not already in print or in the possession of the committee bringing out this bill.

Data to be useful must be live data, and obsolete data are worse than useless—they are cumbersome and obstructive of the search for truth.

At present all labor in the United States should be united in one great purpose, and that purpose is the doing of the appointed task allotted to each and in which he is most capable of achievement for the winning of the war.

Labor is loyal, and with loyal labor the complete success of American arms is assured.

At the present time I do not think there is any such proportion of involuntary employment as will lead to any information of value being acquired by any commission or investigating body.

If we concede, as we must, that there will be a great number of labor problems resulting from the war, that the questions of readjustment and reapportionment of labor are vital ones, as well as the questions of disability and invalidity and other elements which enter into the employment of labor, still present industrial conditions in America, when all this country is speeding up for the purpose of winning the war, are not the normal conditions of America, and the information which will be of benefit to the laboring man and woman will be information relative to normal conditions as they will exist after this great and war emergency has passed?

Therefore I offer this amendment, that there be no creation of this proposed committee until the present war emergency shall be ended.

I attach, with the consent of the committee, a newspaper clipping reciting a called meeting to be held at the University of Illinois in February of this year for the purpose of discussing the questions of labor problems resulting from the war:

LABOR PROBLEMS GROWING OUT OF WAR TO BE CONSIDERED BY EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYEES.

URBANA, ILL., January 13.

Employers and employees are to be brought together in a discussion of "Labor problems resulting from the war" at a congress to be held at the University of Illinois in February. The university, acting in conjunction with the Illinois Manufacturing Association, the Illinois Coal Operators' Association, the National Safety Council, the State Federation of Labor, and many other associations of employers and employees of the State, is holding the congress.

Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor; Charles Piez, of the United States Shipping Board; Victor Olander, secretary of the Illinois State Federation of Labor; and R. C. Richards, chairman of the central safety committee of the Northwestern Railroad, are among many prominent speakers who have been asked to participate in the congress and lead the discussion of the many relating problems.

The congress has been called for the purpose of impressing upon both labor and capital the need of recognizing the human element in production, especially at this time. It is hoped that greater cooperation between employers and wage earners in this State will result, and so further the production for the country, at least during the war.

The congress was made possible by the efforts of several prominent Illinois faculty men, who persuaded the university to invite representatives of employers and employees to Champaign to discuss labor problems, particularly from the standpoint of the effect of the war on them.

Questions concerning the health of the worker, the many injuries which he is subject to at his work, the difficulties of laborers in finding work and of employers in hiring men, and problems of scientific management will be among the topics to be considered. The congress will be held February 14, lasting through February 16.

Mr. KEATING and Mr. McCORMICK rose.

Mr. KEATING. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to support the amendment?

Mr. McCORMICK. No; I desire to oppose it.

Mr. KEATING. Then I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment on the ground that now is the time to begin the accumulation of preliminary information. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] had offered an amendment to postpone the report of the commission until after the war or for a given time after the conclusion of the war, I should have been disposed to have listened to his argument with a good deal of readiness. When all the world is making ready to cope with the problems which must arise from this conflict, to plan for the inevitable readjustment, greater by far than any of us can picture to ourselves, I say, Mr. Chairman, that it would be a grave error to postpone the appointment of such a commission. I shall have amendments to offer to the joint resolution, but to this amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio I for one am absolutely opposed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I question whether this report would be of much value if, as the joint resolution states, the commission is to make its report on December 1, 1918. We all know that industrial and sociological conditions will be radically changed in this country after the return of peace and that there will be some urgent need then to have a report of a commission, as this joint resolution provides, under conditions then existing, rather than under conditions that now exist in this country, which are abnormal and are largely resultant from this war. I recognize the need of having a commission to examine into conditions that will exist after the conclusion of the war, but to create a commission and allow them to go traveling over the world, as this joint resolution provides, during these war times, when everyone knows that this war is going to change completely the sociological conditions of and the obligations of government itself, those who survive from the battle field, as well as those who do not partake but remain in the industrial walks of life, after peace is concluded would make their report of little value. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is a most meritorious one. This work will be of little value if it is going to proceed at the present time. We have had commissions in time of peace, commissions, for instance, on immigration, that have traveled the world over and collected voluminous information, but what value will the findings be of these traveling experts on conditions of to-day, which everyone recognizes will not be normal after the conclusion of the war?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Labor has carefully considered this feature of its report and believes this commission can carry on its work at this time. The argument that the commission will run all over the world in an effort to secure data is not worthy of very serious consideration. The men who will be named on this commission by the President of the United States will undoubtedly be gentlemen of distinction and you will not find them entering the war zone at this time except with the consent of the State Department. So I think we may very well leave the question of their movements to the members of the commission. The committee hopes this amendment will be voted down. I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I should favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], though I would very much rather favor a motion to strike out the enacting clause. I want to talk very seriously to the House for a very few moments because we are facing now a situation we have to meet. There is pending before the Committee on Appropriations deficiency estimates for about a billion and a half dollars and those on the way to the Congress will probably carry that total a couple of millions beyond. Some of these estimates are for matters of first importance; some of them represent the desire of some branches of the Government to use the war as an excuse for expanding its activities and increasing its appropriations.

This country has to-day a surfeit of commissions. We have had commissions about everything under the sun, commissions to reform every institution except our own, where the most reformation could take place. Echoes of the commission on social unrest have not died out before we are met with a proposition to create another commission to report on the subject of old-age pensions and insurance. The speeches of the gentlemen who support this matter, as well as the report which they submit to the House, tell you that there is already a great volume of valuable, accurate information upon the subject. There is no reason in the world why a committee willing to work should not itself gather whatever information is necessary to enable the House and the Congress to legislate upon this subject. I would infinitely rather have the result of its findings than the result of a commission that will be created as this one is proposed to be. We all know something about commissions.

This commission on the causes for social unrest, which, by the way, more than covers the field of reasons for nonemployment or unemployment, went over this country exploiting all sorts of views, from reactionary to what was almost anarchistic. It became a medium for exploiting the political ambitions of at least one of its members, and it would be running yet if Congress had not very wisely put a limit to its activities.

Now we are faced with a proposition to create a new commission. I do not speak against the commission because of an opposition to old-age pensions. I speak against the doing of a useless thing. Those men who favor legislation of this kind will better enhance it by having a committee of Congress deal with it than by having a commission to make a report on it. A commission that would report within a year from now would necessarily make a report that would be bound to be a wrong one, because it would be made as the result of a survey of conditions that are temporary and transitory and could not be the conditions upon which permanent, remedial legislation ought to be based. That must be appreciated by every man of judgment and of sense. Let it not be carried because it is in the interest of labor when the judgment of men is against it. Let no man vote against it because it is for labor, but let no man vote for it simply because it is for labor. Let it stand as any other proposal for a new commission would stand, and I am willing to submit then to the judgment of men.

And let me say one word more. If there ever was a time when the people of America are going to respect and reward courage on the part of public officials it is now. We are not going to be true to our trust if we appropriate moneys without any regard to results. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] fails to grasp the significance of the suggestion that we are now, when we have no unemployment, to prepare for the emergency, to prepare for the change, for the disarrangement, for the dislocation in industry, which will be inevitable with the termination of the war.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield? Will this help to win the war?

Mr. LONDON. Well, I assume that every man and every woman in the United States will do everything to help the United States in the present crisis. The commission has its specific purpose, and that specific purpose is to prepare and to systematize information, to assemble data, which will be helpful to us in those days when it will be necessary to legislate on these problems. It is not a new thing that we are suggesting now. If the gentleman would examine the record of the appropriation bills during Taft's administration he would find that an appropriation bill carried an item for the holding of a congress at which this very question was to be discussed.

And may I say to the House this? That labor throughout the world realizes that now is the time to begin studying this problem. We do not have to wait for unemployment; we do not have to wait for the crisis when the soup kitchen will be suggested as a remedy; we do not have to wait for starvation and distress. A committee of Congress might be an excellent thing, but the suggestion before you is not that. The proposition before you is this: Shall we advance the study of a subject by nominating or appointing a commission, or shall we have no commission at all? Shall we delay until after the war, or shall we begin now to study, investigate, and scrutinize, and look into all the data available for the formation of an intelligent opinion on the subject? See what British labor says now in time of war on this subject:

> Moreover, it can not but be anticipated that in all countries the dislocation of industry attendant on peace, the instant discharge of millions of munition workers and workers in war trades, and the demobilization of soldiers—in face of the scarcity of industrial capital, the shortage of raw materials, and the insecurity of commercial enterprise—will, unless prompt and energetic action be taken by the several Governments, plunge a large part of the wage-earning population into all the miseries of unemployment more or less prolonged.
> In view of the fact that widespread unemployment in any country, like a famine, is an injury not to that country alone, but impoverishes also the rest of the world, the British labor movement holds that it is the duty of every Government to take immediate action, not merely to relieve the unemployed when unemployment has set in, but actually, so far as may be practicable, to prevent the occurrence of unemployment.
> It therefore urges upon the labor parties of every country the necessity of pressing upon their Governments the preparations for plans for the execution of all the innumerable public works (such as the making and repairing of roads and railways, the erection of schools and public buildings, the provision of working-class dwellings, and the reclamation and afforestation of land) that will be required in the near future, not for the sake of finding measures of relief for the unemployed, but with a view to those works being undertaken at such a rate in each locality as will suffice, together with the various capitalist undertakings that may be in progress, to maintain at a fairly uniform level year by year, and throughout each year, the aggregate demand for labor, and thus prevent their being unemployed. It is now known that in this way it is quite possible for any Government to prevent, if it chooses, the very occurrence of any widespread or prolonged involuntary unemployment which, if it is now in any country allowed to occur, is as much the result of Government neglect as is any other epidemic disease.

This bill does not contemplate a system of payments to men who happen to be unemployed, whether they desire to work or not. We are primarily interested in the question of the preventive remedy, how to prevent unemployment, what to do in order that unemployment may not be upon us. It is not a commission to promote unrest. On the contrary, it is a commission to make unrest unnecessary; and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that Members should not hesitate to vote for the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has been exhausted on the resolution.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the vote be now taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the request for unanimous consent that all debate be now closed?

Mr. KEATING. Yes. I ask that all debate be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that all debate be now closed. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves that all debate on the pending amendment be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KEATING. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 48.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe we have all gone crazy, but it seems that some of us are pursuing a very headlong course with regard to the money of the people of the United States. We are going deeper and deeper into the pockets of the people every session of Congress and with almost every bill that comes into this House, and we are doing much of it under cover of war; much of it because the country is in a state of excitement; much of it because it may be politically expedient to pass some of these extravagant measures.

I am glad the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, had his nerve with him this morning and saw his patriotic duty with respect to measures of this kind. The gentleman belongs to the majority party, although there may be members of the minority who may not agree with him. But he had the courage of his convictions this morning, and he spoke out the truth, that we are going far afield in the matter of expenditures, that we are taking great liberties with the money of the common people of the United States in order to promote schemes of one kind and another.

If anyone wants any information in regard to social insurance, all he has to do is to go down to the Department of Labor and pick out any one of hundreds of volumes on social questions that have already been prepared at the expense of the people and which nobody is reading.

Some time ago somebody wanted to know something about immigration, and we appointed a committee which expended nearly a million dollars to acquire information about immigration. That commission toured the world, just as this commission on social insurance will have power and money to do. It published many volumes that are now covered with dust.

Then, again, somebody wanted to know something about our industrial relations. So we created a Commission on Industrial Relations, and that commission toured the country and obtained enough information to satisfy a thousand Congresses, although this Congress probably never read a volume of the proceedings. Yet it published dozens of volumes, and came back session after session to obtain more money in order that it might keep up the agitation throughout the United States as between employer and employee. Now, do we want to get the employer and employee together, or do we want to set them further apart? What is the purpose of this new commission?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I regret I have not the time. I would like to yield, but I am within a minute of the end of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This new commission will have the power and the money to tour the country and invite the representatives of various lines of thought, various theories, and various schemes to come before it, and it will exploit itself and have columns in the newspapers showing unrest, even in time of war. It will stir up trouble to plague Congress, but it will not succeed in settling these social problems. It will come back to ask for more money and still more money, and this first $50,000 will grow into a million dollars before it is done. It will give a number of gentlemen comfortable berths at public expense and an opportunity to make trouble. They may impede railroad progress and go into establishments manufacturing munitions for war and halt the proceedings while they air differences between those who are employing and those who are employed.

I think the time has come to put a quietus upon some of these commissions. I believe, with the gentleman from Kentucky, that this Congress is able to determine these questions for itself. I believe that the various committees of this Congress are as capable as any commission could possibly be to send for witnesses, to send for employees and employers, and to send for books and papers and obtain this information, if they desire it, at first hand. The idea here is that we shall constitute an autocratic body to go forth in our name, spend the people's money, and stir up trouble and unrest, and then come back here and unload the whole thing upon us. We should not encourage it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to emphasize——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, what is pending now before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out the last word in the amendment.

Mr. KEATING. I think that is out of order, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] has submitted an amendment to the House, so that if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is voted on the motion is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is to amend the amendment.

Mr. KEATING. If that is the case, I make the point of order that the gentleman must speak on the amendment.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, is not the gentleman willing that we shall follow the ordinary customs of the House and debate the amendment more fully?

Mr. KEATING. I will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I have no desire to interfere with debate unnecessarily. One week ago we had two hours under the rule——

Mr. GILLETT. That was general debate.

Mr. KEATING. General debate, and with the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] who was present, and of his colleagues on that side of the House, the use of those two hours was waived, with the understanding that we would proceed with the discussion of amendments. Now, I submit, in all fairness to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that much of the discussion which we have had here this morning has nothing to do with the amendment, but is in the nature of general debate, and that we are occupying time which other gentlemen of the House desire to use in the consideration of another bill. When we adjourned on last Wednesday it was with the distinct understanding that we would take up this joint resolution under the five-minute rule and confine ourselves to a discussion of amendments. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] had been present on last Wednesday and had desired to discuss this amendment, having charge of the time on this side of the House I would gladly have yielded him time. I made a general offer to the Members of the House on Wednesday of time for the discussion of this resolution. Under the circumstances I submit that the gentleman should confine himself to the amendment before the committee.

Mr. TOWNER. Before the gentleman from Colorado sits down will he permit me to make this suggestion to him? This amendment necessarily carries with it the consideration of the entire question. It would hardly be possible to consider this amendment without discussing the merits of the entire proposition, and I want to make this further suggestion to the gentleman: Only a few moments ago there was a vote taken by the committee regarding the shutting off of debate, and the committee, by a very large vote, decided not to do it, manifesting, I think, to the satisfaction of anyone, that they desired to discuss it further. Now, does not the gentleman think that he, in charge of the bill, ought to submit to the evident desire of the committee to discuss an important proposition of this sort further?

Mr. KEATING. I am always glad to submit to the will of the House very cheerfully, but I did not understand that the motion which was made was to suspend the rules of the House, and the rules of the House provide that when an amendment is offered the gentleman who addresses himself to the amendment shall confine himself to that. But I will say to the gentleman that I have no desire to interfere unnecessarily with debate. I think in all fairness to other gentlemen who have business coming before the House this afternoon that we should endeavor to dispose of this bill as soon as possible. But for the time being I will not press the point.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss the subject matter of this paragraph, and I have the right to do that under the rules.

I want to emphasize as strongly as I can the argument advanced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the argument just advanced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. This proposition now presented to the House involves the selection of an important and an expensive commission, authorized to do extensive traveling in this country or wherever they may desire to travel, with an expensive equipment of stenographers, secretaries, and clerks, just as big as they want to make it, and with the authority to create here a whole library of books upon these important subjects. I am wondering where the money is to come from for all these tremendous expenses. Facing a budget that will amount to $5,000,000,000 at least, in time of war, when the period is abnormal, when all conditions are abnormal, we are asked here in the resolution which is submitted to inquire into the cause of unemployment, to look into systems of insurance, voluntary and obligatory, to find out how we are providing to meet unemployment, invalidity, and sickness in the future, and to examine and report on a number of other similar matters, including insurance against sickness and old-age pensions. In other words, in the most abnormal period that ever occurred in the history of the world we are asked to make these investigations, with a view to determining what our career as a Nation in the future may be when normal times are restored. The time has come for Members of this body not to get their pictures in a Washington newspaper because they advocate all sorts of raids on the Treasury of the United States—the time has come for a Congress which is courageous enough to send 2,000,000 men, and more than that if necessary, to the French front to work there in trenches for $30 a month—the time has come to show whether we are courageous enough to stop bills of this kind. [Applause.] I am irrevocably against this joint resolution and everything that is in it at this time. These measures, which are purely and absolutely socialistic, ought to be considered in a period of normal times, rather than in a period of abnormal times. This looks to still further tremendous increases in our enormous budget.

An important convention is in progress in this city to-day, if it did not conclude its work yesterday, for the purpose of determining upon equitable methods of taxing, and the method they seem to favor there is to compel the rich, the large incomes, to pay all the expenses of this war and nearly everything else. At the same time, from the capitalistic centers of this country, there issue all sorts of complaints against the kind of taxes we are levying now. The man in this House who belongs to one of these war committees, who with flags flying bring in these war measures, becomes tremendously popular here; but the man on the committee charged with raising the money and with levying the taxes to pay all these enormous expenses becomes the butt of all sorts of ridicule and criticism. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, in order to bring the matter to a conclusion, I offer as a substitute a motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. KEATING. I make the point of order that that comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SHERLEY moves to strike out the enacting clause of the joint resolution.

Mr. KEATING. I make the point of order that the motion is made too late.

The CHAIRMAN. On what ground?

Mr. KEATING. On the ground that the gentleman from Illinois has offered an amendment, and that the motion to strike out the enacting clause must be made before the other amendment is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. This motion is in order at any time before the reading of the bill has been completed. The point of order of the gentleman from Colorado is overruled. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. KEATING. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and the yeas were 101 and the nays were 31.

So the motion prevailed.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUBEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration House joint resolution 189, to provide for a commission to inquire into the advisability of establishing national insurance against unemployment, invalidity, and sickness, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report, in the nature of an amendment, to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-two Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 199, nays 133, not voting 95, as follows:

HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. When Mr. Fitzgerald resigned from the House, although he did not necessarily have to do so, he also resigned from the House Office Building Commission. The Chair appoints in his place the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. SHERLEY, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

MINIMUM WAGE FOR FEDERAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 152) to fix the compensation of certain employees of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this bill is not in order in view of the special order of the House made on December 12 whereby the bills then on the calendar were first to be disposed of, and that then the bill H. R. 269 was to be given a privileged status for consideration. I call the Speaker's attention to the special order that was made on that day, the last Calendar Wednesday before the holiday recess. At that time the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] said:

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the bills now on the calendar which are in order on Calendar Wednesday are disposed of that the bill which we have just a moment ago considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union—H. R. 269—be in order on Calendar Wednesday.

That fixes that bill as virtually the unfinished business of the House, after the bills then on the calendar have been disposed of on Calendar Wednesday. The bill that the gentleman from New York now attempts to bring up for consideration was not on the calendar on that date, but was reported only on January 14, 1918. The reason why I make the point of order is this: The subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is considering very thoroughly the question of an increase of salary of all of the Government employees whose compensation is fixed in that bill. It is also purposed, I believe, to provide for a general percentage increase of all Government employees.

The SPEAKER. That has nothing to do with the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it will be inopportune to bring this bill up for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], in charge of that bill, is not present in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. If any gentleman from his committee desires to call it up, it is in order.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. Is there any gentleman here who desires to press that bill?

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair desires to learn. If any gentleman on Mr. HAYDEN's committee desires to call up the bill 269, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully contend that the order of the House is a call of committees.

The SPEAKER. The committees are now being called.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NOLAN. Does the Chair interpret the unanimous-consent order of Mr. KITCHIN to mean that the Committee on Labor is to be deprived of its two full days?

The SPEAKER. No. The Committee on Labor is not to be deprived of its two full days, but it is the special order of the House that that particular bill take precedence.

Mr. NOLAN. Suppose they get the consent of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] that we may go on?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I shall waive any right that I may have under the special rule, because after investigation I find that it is not workable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the order of the House having been made, no gentleman of the House can set it aside, except by unanimous consent. The order of the House is a fixed order of proceeding, and it is beyond the power of the gentleman from Arizona to set it aside.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, the situation in respect to the special rule is that it was ordered that my bill, H. R. 269, should have precedence over any bills placed on the calendar after that date, but that all bills then on the calendar should be disposed of before my bill was considered.

The SPEAKER. Have they not all been disposed of?

Mr. STAFFORD. Only from the Committee on Labor, Mr. Speaker, and I have made the point of order that this bill which the gentleman from New York seeks to call up now was reported after December 12, when that special order was made.

The SPEAKER. That point of order is good. Has the committee any bill that was on the calendar before the 12th of December? If so, the Chair will recognize any gentleman on that committee to call it up.

Mr. MAHER. No; we have not.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. What difference does it make whether it was reported before the 12th of December or not?

The SPEAKER. Because there is a special order of the House to that effect.

Mr. LONDON. I know; but that special order is out of the way now.

The SPEAKER. No; it is not. The special order provides that when bills already on the calendar are disposed of that Mr. HAYDEN's bill shall have precedence over what are put on the calendar afterwards.

Mr. LONDON. I know, but the Hayden bill is out of the way now.

The SPEAKER. How does the gentleman determine that?

Mr. LONDON. I asked the Speaker to ask the House whether anybody was going to press the Hayden bill, and we have the statement before the House now that the Hayden bill is withdrawn, and all of the rights that he has under that rule have been waived.

Mr. SHERLEY. He can not waive the right. There is an order of the House and the Hayden bill is not in order until every bill that was on the calendar has been disposed of——

The SPEAKER. That was on the calendar prior to the 12th of December.

Mr. SHERLEY. Prior to the date of the order.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that the House has just been considering a bill that was placed on the calendar after December 12.

The SPEAKER. But nobody raised the point of order; if so, it would have been knocked out. The Chair can not go around hunting up points of order; he has enough to do anyhow. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk began to call the committees.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. KEATING. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEATING. Now, the Committee on Labor, under the rules of the House, would be entitled to two full days. The committee has occupied less than one full day. The Chair now rules, as I understand it, that the roll of committees shall be called because of this unanimous-consent arrangement. May I ask the Chair when the Committee on Labor will have another opportunity to present its business to the House?

The SPEAKER. Here is the way of it: Each committee has two days if it has business enough to occupy two days. If it has not enough grist to occupy the time the Chair causes the roster to be called and you go on. The Committee on Labor will be called when the wheel again revolves.

Mr. KEATING. But the Committee on Labor has business and is prepared to go on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, but it is out of order under this special order. How that special order came to be made the Chair does not know. It is a good deal of a puzzle to the Chair to know why that thing was fixed that way.

Mr. KEATING. The Chair holds all bills which were not on the calendar on the date that special order was adopted can not be considered?

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the Chair holds, until we get through with the bills which were on the calendar prior to the 12th.

Mr. KEATING. Then, do we revert, for instance, to the Committee on Labor?

The SPEAKER. You do not. If that committee has any bill that is in order, why it can call it up right now, but if it is not in order you can not call it up. Now here is this special order——

Mr. KEATING. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, despite the special order, the House now proceed to the consideration of this minimum-wage bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent——

Mr. RAINEY. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Patents.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise for a point of order——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. That there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-six gentlemen are present—not a quorum.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LONDON and Mr. STAFFORD. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 91.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California demands tellers.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. NOLAN. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 116, noes 51.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California demands the yeas and nays. Twenty-one gentlemen have risen in the affirmative, not a sufficient number.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I submit that it is not necessary to have a quorum to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The House can adjourn without a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

So the motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 17, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting reports from accounting officers of this department showing what officers of the Government were delinquent in rendering their accounts for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 810); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Department of the Treasury to provide an interest teller for the office of the Treasurer of the United States for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 811); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SINNOTT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5489) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange for lands in private ownership lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 241), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 17, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we ask Thy guidance and blessing upon the labor of this day, that it may be done under the inspiration of Thy holy Spirit, that we may have an eye single to Thy glory, and that the accomplishments of the day may add to the happiness and prosperity of all the people whom we serve. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1918.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, a Senator from the State of Alabama, to perform the duties of the chair during my absence.

WILLARD SAULSBURY,
President pro tempore.

Mr. BANKHEAD thereupon assumed the chair.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hitchcock	New	Sterling
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Stone
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Poindexter	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Thomas
Curtis	Kellogg	Ransdell	Tillman
Fernald	Kirby	Robinson	Townsend
Fletcher	Knox	Shafroth	Trammell
Gallinger	McKellar	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gerry	McLean	Simmons	Wadsworth
Gronna	McNary	Smith, Ga.	Watson
Hale	Martin	Smith, Md.	Weeks
Harding	Myers	Smith, S. C.	Wolcott
Hardwick	Nelson	Smoot

Mr. TOWNSEND. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is still detained from the Senate by illness. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] for the day.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce the continued absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of illness.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] are detained on important business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. THOMAS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER announced his signature to the bill (S. 3235) amending section 32, Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House.

PETITIONS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Rural Letter Carriers' Association of Grafton County, N. H., praying for an increase in the salaries of rural letter carriers, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SUTHERLAND presented a petition of the Pan Handle Agricultural Club of Brooke County, W. Va., praying for the conservation of food, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMOOT. I present a petition from Prof. William H. Hart and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing with the view of publishing the same as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so referred.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2886) for the relief of Albert O. Brown, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 196) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 1084) for the relief to J. G. Seupelt, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 197) thereon.

Mr. SHAFROTH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2487) permitting Frances Mack Mann to purchase certain public lands, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 198) thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, asked to be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on Finance, which was agreed to:

A bill (S. 3473) to provide for the importation into the United States, without the payment of duty, of raw materials, parts or partly fabricated parts of equipment, and finished equipment for war purposes; and

A bill (S. 3474) to amend section 600 of an act entitled "An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1917.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 6176) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va., and I submit a report (No. 199) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL PAGES.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I make a favorable report upon Senate resolution 184, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 184, submitted by Mr. OVERMAN on the 16th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to employ three additional pages for the Senate Chamber at $2.75 per day each for a period lasting until the end of the present session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution. In making this request I wish to state that the force of pages has not been increased in 30 or 35 years, whereas the membership of the Senate has increased largely and, as everyone knows, the business has increased during these war times greatly. We do not have enough pages to do the work. We have two extra 'phones in the cloakrooms, which require the attendance of pages. The Sergeant at Arms says that he has not enough pages to do the work necessary for Senators in carrying messages, and so forth. I therefore ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not care to object to the present consideration of the resolution, but in view of the statement of the Senator from North Carolina, I suggest that it be amended so that the increase shall be limited to the duration of the present war.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is limited to the present session.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not so understand the resolution when it was read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 3534) granting an increase of pension to John S. Jordan (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 3535) for the relief of Lloyd D. Barley; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 3536) to amend the military records in relation to William M. Cheuvront; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 3537) for the relief of the estate of Henry Ware, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 3538) for the relief of the heirs of John J. and Mary S. Englebright; and

A bill (S. 3545) granting an increase of pension to Henry Brown;

A bill (S. 3546) granting an increase of pension to Jeanie G. Lyles;

A bill (S. 3547) granting a pension to Margaret M. King;

A bill (S. 3548) granting an increase of pension to Christopher C. Kelly;

A bill (S. 3549) granting a pension to Hiram B. Kelly;

A bill (S. 3550) granting a pension to Mrs. W. H. Holmes;

A bill (S. 3551) granting a pension to Phoebe W. Hooper;

A bill (S. 3552) granting a pension to Lucy S. Hamilton;

A bill (S. 3553) granting a pension to Anna C. Gregory;

A bill (S. 3554) granting a pension to William H. Emery;

A bill (S. 3555) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Price;

A bill (S. 3556) granting a pension to Anne E. Newbury;

A bill (S. 3557) granting a pension to John A. McCarthy;

A bill (S. 3558) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth McKeever;

A bill (S. 3559) granting an increase of pension to George W. McKelvey;

A bill (S. 3560) granting a pension to William G. Neeley;

A bill (S. 3561) granting a pension to Cora E. Myers Barton (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3562) granting a pension to Jennie Perry (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 125) authorizing the Joint Committee on the Library to provide for the restoration and completion of the historical frieze in the Rotunda of the Capitol; to the Committee on the Library.

SUSPENSION OF CIVIL PROCESS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have received a letter from the Hon. H. J. Snively, chairman of the legal advisory board of Yakima County, Wash., relating to registrants, and making a suggestion with reference to the suspension of civil process. I wish to read a paragraph or two from the letter, and then introduce a bill which I think covers the situation. He is one of the leading attorneys in our State and a man thoroughly conversant with the situation in connection with the registrants. He says:

I received your letter in relation to the passage of an act by Congress to stay suits against young men in the National Army. I have never looked up the question as to the authority of Congress to stay process in the State courts. I know during the Civil War that State laws were passed by the States.

It occurred to me, however, that as part of the conscription act, or as an amendment to it, that Congress would have the power to stay process against soldiers, and my particular purpose in writing you now is this:

I am chairman of the legal advisory board of Yakima County, and have been in close touch with the registrants from this county. I find quite a number of young men who have been engaged in business, would like very much to waive exemption they might have by virtue of being engaged in agricultural pursuits, particularly if they were assured that existing indebtedness would not be pressed against them during their absence.

Practically all of these young men in this country have made their own starts, and they are more or less involved in debt. As I told you in my other letter, I know of some great hardships that already have been vested upon soldiers taken away from their business and put into the National Army.

I do not know of any one thing that would encourage young men either to volunteer or to waive exemption than the passage of an act to protect them in their absence from judgments.

Then he proceeds to urge that Congress ought to take action along these lines:

Certainly Congress has the power to do what is necessary to encourage enlistment or to encourage the waiver of exemptions. The trouble about State legislatures being convened is that it would take too long a time. Meantime claims could be put into judgments.

I had suggested that some question had been raised as to the power of Congress to go into the States and close their courts and stop their processes.

Mr. President, I know that a bill has been presented regarding this matter, and I know that there are very serious questions with reference to the authority of Congress to suspend process in local courts, and so on, but it seems to me we ought to take some action, and we ought to take it promptly, if there is any action that we possibly can take. It has occurred to me that there is a very simple way to take care of it, and I desire to introduce a bill along the lines I have in mind for that purpose. I ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I want to urge that that committee take prompt action, one way or the other. It should do something if we have the power, and if we have no power it should say so, that agencies that can act may do so.

The bill (S. 3533) to prevent service of civil process during the war upon those enlisted in the military service of the United States was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever, during the war and prior to the making and ratification of the treaty of peace terminating it, shall serve, attempt to serve, or assist in serving, any process upon any person enlisted in the military service of the United States for the collection or enforcement of any claim arising prior to such enlistment shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

AMENDMENT TO DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $252,900.58 for the relief of Prof. William H. H. Hart, principal of the Hart Farm School and Junior Republic for Dependent Children, as settlement in full for his costs incurred, losses sustained, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

STANDARDIZATION OF WAGES.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, on yesterday a motion was made to refer a certain bill to the Naval Committee. That motion went over for a day, and I now ask permission to call it up.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia delay that request for a moment, in order that I may make a statement?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I am obliged to the Senator.

Mr. President, by the courtesy of the Senator from Virginia I make this statement: On yesterday the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] called up Senate resolution 174, directing the Committee on Education and Labor to inquire into certain subjects mentioned. At my request he was kind enough to let the resolution lie over until to-day on my statement that I desired to address the Senate when the resolution was under consideration. The Senator from Utah advises me from his home this morning that he is physically so indisposed as not to be able to attend the session of the Senate to-day, but authorizes me to call up the resolution, if I so desire. When I gave the notice on yesterday of my intention to address the Senate this morning I was under a misapprehension with respect to the date of an important engagement I had. I thought the engagement was for 2 o'clock to-morrow, whereas it is for 2 o'clock to-day. I feel under some obligation to keep that appointment.

I had intended, under the authority of the Senator from Utah, to call up his resolution this morning; but after being informed that the engagement of which I speak is for to-day instead of to-morrow, I had intended to give notice that I would call up the resolution if the Senator from Utah was not present on to-morrow, and speak then. I am now told that it is probably the wish of Senators to adjourn the Senate at the conclusion of to-day's business until Monday. That may not occur, of course, but I have consulted with our floor leader, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and others, and that, I am informed, may occur. So I wish merely to state that, in view of the circumstances related, I shall ask the Senator from Utah to call up his resolution not earlier than Monday next, to which date I postpone what I had in mind to say to-day.

SUSPENSION OF ORDER OF FUEL ADMINISTRATOR.

Mr. SWANSON obtained the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me, as the matter which he intends to bring before the Senate will probably take some time? I have a resolution which I desire to present.

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska temporarily.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Virginia that I also have a resolution which I desire to present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 186), as follows:

Resolved, That the Fuel Administrator of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to delay for five days the order suspending the operation of industrial plants in portions of the United States, in order that protests may be heard, investigation made, and information presented.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had hurriedly prepared a resolution on the same subject as that which has been submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], which I will ask the Secretary to read. If the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska shall be agreed to, very likely I shall not think it necessary to press the consideration of the resolution I offer, but I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The Secretary read the resolution as follows:

Whereas through the newspaper press it has been brought to the attention of the Congress and the country that an order has been issued by the Fuel Administrator providing for the closing down of a large portion of our industrial establishments; and

Whereas on information already received it would seem to be of serious doubt whether such order would not prove highly detrimental to both the industrial and labor interests of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that such order should be suspended until a thorough investigation shall be made as to the necessity for the proposed action.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the resolution which I have presented asks the Fuel Administrator only for a delay of five days. I do not assume to say that the Fuel Administrator has made a mistake. All I ask for is sufficient time to permit the country to be heard from. The thing which he has done has been properly denominated "a national disaster."

Mr. President, it may be necessary; there may be such a grave situation confronting the fuel administration, such a grave situation concerning the supply of fuel for the ships that we must send overseas, and such a grave situation confronting the railroads that drastic action of this sort is necessary; but, before it is taken, the short time of five days should certainly be afforded the country to present the facts to the Fuel Administrator; and, if necessary, to the President.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do, for a question.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska. In the absence of the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures [Mr. REED], I want to state to the Senator that that subcommittee has had this question under consideration for six weeks; a great mass of testimony has been taken; and we are just about to conclude our investigations and make a report upon the subject matter. I think that if this resolution, which I very heartily approve, is passed the information the Senator wants can be obtained from the testimony taken by our committee. I think that the resolution ought to be adopted, for I regard it as a national calamity that such an order should have been issued. It can be justified only upon the theory that the coal used in the factories is needed to prevent the poor women and children from freezing. Personally I have great respect for Dr. Garfield, the Fuel Administrator, and I in no way question the loftiness of his motives; but it strikes me that this order is without justification under the circumstances.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me to continue, I wish to say the fact is that this thing has come upon the country like a flash of lightning out of a clear sky. It means the closing down of hundreds—and perhaps thousands—of industrial establishments of the country at a time when we have been straining every effort to keep those establishments up to their greatest production. It means the throwing out of work of hundreds of thousands—and perhaps millions—of men whose wages are necessary to their daily existence. It will involve establishments which are manufacturing munitions and other necessary articles for the Government; it will involve establishments that are operating in some cases largely by water power, and which only use a small amount of fuel, yet they are included within this very drastic order; it will involve the closing down of establishments which have coal in their bins, perhaps sufficient to operate them for another month, and that coal will be absolutely idle for the time being. It is, Mr. President, such a revolutionary order, it involves evils of such tremendous moment to so many millions of people, that I can not think it an unwise thing to pause for five days to give an opportunity for the presentation of arguments. That has not been permitted, Mr. President, up to the present time. There was no foreboding, no warning of this, and those interested and having information, so far as I know, have been given no opportunity to present it.

I have the greatest respect for the Fuel Administrator; I feel that he has been struggling against the most tremendous obstacles endeavoring to perform an almost impossible task, and I would not add to his burden; but I believe that the country ought to be given an opportunity to present facts, information, and protests, if necessary. Possibly the result may be a modification of the order; certainly the interests are so tremendous and the damage will be so enormous that the five days ought to be allowed; and I hope the Senate will make this request of the Fuel Administrator.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have before me the legislation on which this order rests, if it rests anywhere; and while I am in hearty sympathy with the Senator's resolution it seems to me it ought to be directed to the President of the United States, because all the authority under which this act can be predicated is, unless I am mistaken from a cursory examination of the law, conferred on the President and not on the Fuel Administrator, who is a mere agent and servant of the President. So I think we had better change the form of the Senator's resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, the Senate has no official information; all the information it gets is from the newspapers of this morning that the Fuel Administrator has issued this order. I have read that he has issued it as the result of consultation with the President. But, Mr. President, the unfortunate situation of affairs at this time is this: One branch of the Government is doing one thing, while another branch of the Government is doing another thing, and another branch of the Government is doing still another thing, and we have no coordination of the enormous forces which have been placed in the hands of the Executive. I am very firmly of the opinion that many Government agencies will be handicapped by this order, and I doubt very much whether some of them have been consulted or considered before it was issued.

The situation argues strongly for a reform in our Government; and, Mr. President, I am here now to predict that before much time elapses we will be compelled by the very force of circumstances to locate somewhere absolute power to coordinate the various branches and functions of our Government which are now largely running wild.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What possible improvement could the Senator suggest in that connection as to centralizing authority than is provided now by the Constitution of the United States, which centralizes authority over every one of these activities in the President of the United States?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, that is a fair question, and I have no doubt that it is going to be debated on the floor of the Senate at an early date. Without violating any confidence I may say that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs within a very few days, through the chairman of the committee [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], will present to the Senate in concrete form a recommendation for centralizing the various war forces of our Government, so that we will not only get action, but consistent and harmonious action. That is another question. As it is now, we have the President vested nominally with enormous powers, but he is operating through various branches of Government, through various departments of Government, through various officials, who practically are not in harmony with each other; they are not coordinated as they should be, and it is utterly impossible for the President of the United States, with the vast and varied duties he has to perform now, largely of an international character, to bring this about.

The reform which I think should be brought about is such a reform as will place above the Cabinet now existing and below the President a war cabinet to bring all these forces into a few hands, to harmonize them, coordinate them, and bring order out of chaos. If we had established heretofore such a war cabinet, I do not believe there would have developed a coal shortage, which is partly, at least, due to a confusion of government functions. Nor would such an extraordinary order as this have been issued without being submitted to that war cabinet, and that war cabinet would not have acted without knowing definitely the effect on the various industries of the country which would result from it.

Mr. WEEKS and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. I rose because I thought the Senator was about to yield the floor. I do not care to interrupt him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am about to yield the floor; I have said all that I care to say; I have said perhaps more than I should have said. I understand unanimous consent has been granted for the consideration of the resolution, and I hope that it may be adopted. Of course it is only in the nature of a request; it is in the nature of a request from the Senate of the United States simply for a delay to afford an opportunity to present the vast interests that are involved in this revolutionary order, which was apparently issued without giving the country much opportunity for a hearing.

Mr. WEEKS obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Nebraska takes his seat——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LEWIS. I merely desired to address an inquiry to the Senator from Nebraska. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has yielded the floor, and the Senator from Massachusetts has been recognized.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Massachusetts having been recognized, I will not interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I can not speak too strongly in favor of the resolution which has been introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] or a resolution which will have the same or a similar effect.

This order of the Fuel Administrator has fallen with crushing force on the section of the country which I in part represent. It is in this part of the country, Mr. President, where the Government's necessities are being provided at this time. I am told that 86 per cent of all the additional business—the $19,000,000,000 of additional business that is being done this year—is concentrated between Massachusetts and Virginia and east of Pittsburgh. Necessarily the Government requires a large amount of products, and requires them at once. We are doing everything we can to "jack up" the service, so that this product will be furnished. Why, one telephone message that I have this morning from a manufacturer states that the closing down of his mills—and two-thirds of their capacity is being used in manufacturing Government products—will result in a loss of $2,000,000 of product. In other words, in the case of the very things which we need, and need most, to prosecute this war, in that one instance there is going to be a falling off in supply on account of this order of more than $1,300,000.

I can not believe that this question has been suitably considered from every viewpoint. It illustrates the injustice that is likely to result from an order which seems to be right from one viewpoint, but which is made without taking into consideration the influences and effects it may have in various other directions.

I sincerely hope that some action will be taken by the Senate which will stay this procedure until the public has an opportunity to be heard. The Senator from Nebraska has well said that this action seems to be an excellent example of the failure to prepare for an emergency which was as apparent six months ago as it is now. Reasonable foresight would have made ample provision for the conditions which now prevail.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, it was my privilege last Saturday in New York to confer with the coal administrator of that State and with the representatives of Dr. Garfield temporarily in the city. The proposition first was to apply this order to the State of New York; but when we came to reason out the fact that practically everything going abroad comes through the "neck of the bottle" to the great port of New York we were able to convince the authorities that such a proposition would be the very worst thing that could happen to the country.

In New York City to-day, Mr. President, there are 300,000 children unable to attend school. Throughout our State at least one-fourth of our industries are closed for lack of coal. This morning, by telephone, a New York shipbuilder—a man who employs upward of 10,000 men, all of whom are engaged in Government work—informed me that he has enough coal to keep his plant going for three weeks, and that under this order, as he interprets it, he will be compelled to shut down to-morrow morning.

I submit, Mr. President, that in April the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and myself introduced and had passed resolutions requesting information from the Federal Trade Commission relative to the supply of coal. We were informed at that time that it was simply a "state of mind" on the part of the people of the country. We were told that there was sufficient coal if people would not buy so recklessly. To-day a situation confronts us that convinces the country that those in charge of the Nation's business failed to apply ordinary business principles.

Mr. President, it seems to me that what we need in this Nation to-day on many of these commissions is men with business training, men who will plan in advance as men would plan to build a city, and then coordinate all the elements so that really effective work may be done.

Mr. President, this is perhaps one of the most serious orders that ever has been attempted to be put forth in the history of this Nation. I do hope that the resolution introduced may prevail, to the end that some information may be obtained before the order is put into effect.

Mr. POMERENE obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will state his inquiry.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to inquire whether the debate upon this motion is subject to the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair knows of no rule that requires such limitation.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not understand the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not think debate on the resolution is subject to the five-minute rule.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, I will accept the decision of the Chair; but I think the best thing to do is to pass this resolution and debate it afterwards.

Mr. STONE. That is true, Mr. President. It is best to pass it and debate it afterwards; but I have been sitting here in some wonderment to know who would speak on the other side, if there be another side, and tell the Senate authoritatively why this order was made.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator, if he will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I thought I had been recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator was recognized, and the Chair understood that he yielded to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. POMERENE. I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I beg pardon; I did not know that the Senator from Ohio had been recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. STONE. Perhaps the Senator from Ohio can answer the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri for a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I will make this answer to the Senator from Missouri: I shall speak this morning for myself and for no one else.

Mr. STONE. That is not any answer at all.

Mr. POMERENE. No; I realize it is not. I meant it in a courteous way. I was not referring to the Senator.

Mr. President, I regard this order as a calamity. I feel that at the present time there is no necessity for it. When it is shown to me that there is a necessity for it, I shall apologize for what I have been saying and what I may say.

I think I know something about the coal conditions in Ohio. We have enough coal in that State to last the people of our State until our grandchildren are gray-haired men, and yet our people in Ohio are suffering as perhaps the people in no other State are suffering, and in my judgment it is due to the way in which this subject has been handled.

As early as October of last year we had a severe cold spell in the State. The attorney general sent to me a list of 205 towns, 150 of which were without a pound of coal in the markets, and only a portion of the private consumers had any coal in their cellars. When I took this list with me to the Fuel Administrator's office and saw one of the subordinates, the chief not being there, I presented the list. It gave the names of the towns, the amount of last year's consumption, the amount which would be needed for this year's consumption, and the names of the mayors. I was then told that the conditions there were "exaggerated"; and I was told that by a man who, I think, knows as little about the coal supply in Ohio as I know about the coal supply in the planet Mars.

Later on, when I communicated with the office, giving information sent to me by telegram and telephone, some clerk, perhaps, or perhaps some errand boy would answer the telephone; and I have had little different experience several times when I was able to get in touch with some of those in authority. Later on, when I presented telegrams from chambers of commerce and from local fuel administrators, I was again met with the explanation that the situation was being exaggerated; and just recently I understand the coal administrator said the situation was "purely psychological." And now, with this "psychological" situation before him, he makes an order that is so drastic that even those who have a supply of coal on hand will not be permitted to use it. In the language of Virgil, "Wonderful to relate!"

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator believe that any such order as that is valid in law or can be enforced anywhere?

Mr. POMERENE. I have not examined the statute in the light of this order, but I dare say that it was not in the mind of any Senator or Congressman who voted for it that any such order ever would be made.

Mr. President, I want to point out what I think are a few of the mistakes that have been made in this connection. Before I go to that branch of the subject, allow me to say that within two weeks one of the biggest coal operators in this country, who owns 15,000 acres of the best coal land in this country, said to me in my office that this coal legislation had saved the day for the consumer, and that if it had not been for it he to-day would be paying from $25 to $30 a ton. And yet, after the orders were made fixing the prices—and I recognize the fact that it was necessary to make certain modifications of those orders as applied to certain places—it was not, in my judgment, necessary to raise these prices in certain localities as they have been raised.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio permit a remark?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to tell the Senator that if we paid $100 a ton in South Carolina we could not get a ton of coal, because it is not there, and the railroad from Dante, Va.—the Clinchfield, with many trains loaded with coal—gives as an excuse that it has not locomotives and can not bring it to South Carolina. It is a question of transportation.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true, perhaps.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not "true, perhaps"; it is true. I know it from telegrams I have received from home.

Mr. POMERENE. It ought to be there, though. The remark demonstrates, in my judgment, the fact that it was not high prices that were necessary for increased production.

Later, though in my own city we formerly got coal at 90 cents a ton at the mines for our factories, during the last year they were paying five dollars and five dollars and a half a ton at the mines; and then, when a priority order was issued to the railroads for lake shipments, the coal operators gave as an excuse for not giving coal to the ordinary consumer that an order had been made to them to ship none save that to the lake region. It was not true, and the coal operators who made that statement knew it was not true when they made it.

Later, when we were all concerned about conditions up the Lakes, and there was an attempt to move coal to the Northwest, in order to take care of the good people in that section, nobody made any complaint about that in Ohio, as long as that order was reasonably carried out; but what was the situation? The coal was sent to the Lake ports when there were no vessels there on which to load this coal for the Northwest, and nearly every siding and every switch in the cities of Cleveland and Toledo and Sandusky were filled with cars loaded for the Lakes, and these cars were left there loaded in that way for storage purposes, while the people in my own State were suffering and the cars and the coal were needed elsewhere.

In the little manufacturing city of Alliance, on the Pennsylvania system, in the latter part of November there were 30 or 40 cars loaded for the Lakes right at the doors of one of our big manufacturing plants. Those cars were there for 30 or 40 days, not moved, not emptied, and many of the big manufacturing plants there were obliged to shut down. Those cars could have been unloaded, sent back to the mines, and reloaded three or four times while they were standing on the siding in Alliance. It was not done. Schools were obliged to close down. The great Ohio State University was obliged to close down for several days because there was no coal. On the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad one-half of their cars were on the tracks, loaded with coal and not moving.

Mr. TILLMAN. Whose fault was that but the railroads'?

Mr. POMERENE. It was the fault of both the operators and the railroads.

Mr. TILLMAN. They were in collusion, then.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, while these cars were thus being loaded for certain places up in the Northwest, our people in Ohio were given to understand that there was not any coal for them.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that a portion of that difficulty originated because of priority orders, as well as a law of Congress that permits the purchaser or the seller to designate the route over which the purchase shall travel?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think it is true that a part of the difficulty arose from that particular cause; but not all of it. I think I can say that cars would have been moved to any locality that needed the coal if the request had come from the Coal Administrator.

I happen to have before me here an account of a shipment of a car of coal from the southeastern part of the State up to Cleveland and back to the mine again. From the time it was first loaded and sent to Cleveland and back again to another mine 28 days intervened. Twenty days one hour and thirty-two minutes of that time was lost when the car was not moving. It was, in fact, moving eight days one hour and five minutes. This car was traced by a newspaper man, who was sent out specially to note the time that it was moving and the places where it was left on the sidings along the road on its way to Cleveland and return. I do not care to go into the particulars of that.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the contention of the Senator from Ohio is that the priority order sending all these cars to the Northwest on the 30th of November unloaded so much coal there that they could not distribute it. I understand that so much coal was sent to a city that the wagons could not haul it for distribution, and that it was poured in there and delayed, and the cars were held up, instead of sending to the Northwest the coal that they could handle and distribute. Is that the impression the Senator has?

Mr. POMERENE. There were too many of the cars loaded with coal for the Northwest. I say too many because there were not vessels at the ports in which they could be unloaded, and that coal should have been distributed through the State of Ohio and elsewhere, and people would have been benefited by it.

Mr. SWANSON. I know; but the great difficulty in getting coal in Virginia, where a superabundance of coal is produced—more than the State needs—was because it was furnished elsewhere on account of this order. I thought at the time that the sending of the coal into one section where they did not have boats to carry it across the lake and did not have horses and wagons sufficient to distribute to the consumers in the cities, where it was loaded in freight cars that for days and days were unloaded, was unwise administration. If they had sent to the Northwest the coal that they could handle quickly and promptly, giving them the preference, and let the rest of the country be supplied, they could have handled it. Is that the impression the Senator has or of those who know?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know that I followed the Senator. My attention was diverted.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to say, if the Senator from Ohio will permit me, that if the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] refers to the port of Duluth as the Northwest he is entirely mistaken. There was a good deal of coal loaded for the Lakes that was going to Canada when our people could not get coal.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know where it was going.

Mr. KELLOGG. There was a good deal of coal which was shipped to Canada that was not destined for the Northwest. There is a shortage of coal in Minnesota and north Wisconsin, and but for the heroic efforts of people up there to cut wood and send it out into the country where they have been using coal there would be a shortage now. You can not ship coal into the Northwest by rail; it never has been done; and you can not run a boat in the wintertime.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize the difficulties the State of Minnesota has had. It is true, as the Senator has said, that much of this coal was sent across into Canada. Just five minutes before I took the floor I had a telephone message from a very prominent man in Ohio, who said to me that he, the other day, had talked with a Canadian who had been in one of the large cities of Canada, and that they had coal there to last them until the middle of July, a good part of which came from Ohio.

Mr. GALLINGER. In this connection, has the Senator from Ohio any information that would throw any light on the subject from this point of view: While the shortage has been accumulating in this country, and it now has reached the acute stage, can the Senator tell us what amount of coal has been sent across the ocean and into Canada to supply the wants of people of other countries?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I do not have that information at hand.

Mr. GALLINGER. But undoubtedly it has been a very large quantity, has it not?

Mr. POMERENE. That is undoubtedly true; but it must also be borne in mind that there has been more coal mined in the United States during the last year than ever before in its history, running as much as eight to ten million tons per month in excess of what it has been in any other year.

Mr. GALLINGER. Which would indicate that if the matter had been carefully handled we would have had enough coal for our own use and a surplus besides.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, when I know there is enough coal in our hills to last this country for centuries and enough miners to mine it, I can not be persuaded that there is any just reason why we should have this shortage at this particular time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not there is a sufficient amount of coal now mined to take care of the needs of the people of this country if it could be properly distributed?

Mr. GALLINGER. And kept at home.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know that I can answer the Senator exactly, save this, and I want to be perfectly frank. There was a time when the operators were not making proper efforts to mine their coal. That situation is different now, after they succeeded in boosting the prices of it. Then the complaint was that there was a car shortage, and I think there is something in that proposition now. If there were cars enough at these mines at the present time to take the supply that can be mined by the miners now at work, there is not any question about there being sufficient coal for everybody.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then it is more a question of transportation than it is a question of shortage of coal; a matter of moving coal rather than the mining of coal to-day.

Mr. POMERENE. At this particular time I think the Senator is correct. In Ohio there has been a very severe cold spell. They are lacking in motive power somewhat. But when I took the floor I did not expect to dwell so much upon the particular branch of the subject upon which I am speaking as to make this suggestion with reference to the particular resolution which has been presented by the Senator from Nebraska. It seems to me that from every point of view this order is an unwise one.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. If it is an unwise one, which the consensus of opinion seems to support, has the Senate and the Congress of the United States been reduced to such impotency as that it can do nothing else than merely request a Fuel Administrator to suspend it?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I was about to ask a question which may perhaps clear this up a bit. The resolution introduced by the Senator from Nebraska speaks of the fuel commissioner, and I notice the Senator from Ohio speaks of the Fuel Administrator. I should like to know whether there is such a legal office as either the fuel commissioner or Fuel Administrator. I know of none. I know of no act of Congress creating a fuel administrator or fuel commissioner. It seems to me it is almost undignified for the Senate of the United States to address a request to some one who was appointed by some other authority. Let us address our request to the authority that is exercising the power conferred by Congress, and the only authority that we have any direct relation to. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will alter his resolution so that it will apply to the proper authority which deals with the subject and preserve the dignity of the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Section 25 of the food and fuel act relates to the subject of coal and fuel, and under that the President was authorized to appoint an agent to carry out the provisions of the act; in other words, to administer it, and the name has been given to him of, I think, United States Fuel Administrator, as I now recall it.

Mr. KNOX. Just so, and undoubtedly under the law the various departments may appoint people to carry out the provisions of the law, appoint special counsel, and all that sort of thing, but when the Congress of the United States comes to deal with the subject and inquire why a particular thing is being done, or why a particular thing is not being done, it does not address its resolution to the clerks who are actually performing the work.

Mr. POMERENE. The order was issued by the Fuel Administrator, and it would seem to me with entire propriety he could be named.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will yield I have taken the liberty of modifying my resolution so as to make the title "Fuel Administrator." If the Senator will permit me to say it, it seems to me we are merely quibbling over an unimportant matter when we debate whether this resolution of request shall be addressed to the President or to the administrator. The fact is that when the administrator acts he acts with the full power of the President. He is not a mere clerk. He is vested with the power that Congress has placed in the President, and the thing for us to do is to cut red tape and get the request to him. He is the one who made the order. He is the one to grant the relief by a modification of the order.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I want to say just a word with respect to the policy of the issuing of this order. I speak particularly with reference to conditions in my own State. I know that a good many of our manufacturing plants have been obliged already to close down temporarily because they could not get the fuel. I know that certain interurban lines have stopped moving their cars and these interurban lines have been furnishing the electric power for many of the smaller towns and the electric lighting along the routes. They are without coal. There has been unusual suffering because of this very severe cold. The situation had begun to improve in Ohio until a few days ago. The cars were moving. The heavy snow interfered somewhat. It does seem to me that if there was just a little delay, and there was not any other human means by which to improve the situation, automatically some of the manufacturing plants would be compelled to close down. Why should an order be made compelling a manufacturing plant to close down that already had in its bins a sufficient supply of coal to continue its operations?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I had a long-distance phone from a manufacturing center in my State a few moments ago asking if this order would affect those manufacturing plants that derive their power from water. Through my office I made inquiry of the Fuel Administration what would be expected of those mills or those manufacturing plants that use water. The reply that was given to me was that, though they might not have any authority over water power, they would expect the plants deriving their power from water to obey this order to the letter.

Mr. REED. Who gave that?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was reported to me as coming from the office of the Fuel Administrator.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if plants are to be closed down arbitrarily, as they will be closed under this order if it is permitted to continue, I do not like to think of the psychological effect that it will have on the people in the country.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HARDING. There is apparently a confusion relating to priority. There is the priority of railroad service on the one hand, but my understanding is that the embarrassment relating to the coal situation is due to the priority order which goes to the operator directing him to supply coal to a certain consumer. I wanted to ask my colleague, who seems to know pretty well concerning the situation, if he has any knowledge as to what has been the determining influence or what reasoning these priority orders are based upon?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not think I can answer my colleague with exactness, except to say that I have gleaned this knowledge from my interviews had with the department: I know there was a desire at the department to supply the schools and the municipal and public utilities, and orders with reference to the movement of cars were made so as to accommodate those utilities and public institutions. Beyond that I have not been advised that there has been any priority order, so far as the furnishing of coal by the operators is concerned.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I inquire of the Senator if he has a copy of the order, or if he has the matter in such a shape as to be authentic? We might be engaged here in fighting a windmill, and we do not want to do that.

Mr. POMERENE. No. I was very much surprised at this order last night, and I have not had an opportunity to get the order.

Mr. FLETCHER. Some one ought to furnish the order and let us have the order read.

Mr. POMERENE. I am speaking of the effect upon the country at the present time. Now, let us just think of what the effect is going to be when some of these plants are closed down; plants that had a coal supply on hand, and their men are thrown out of work, and they are around on the street corners or elsewhere, not able to earn anything, and some of them not able to get the coal with which to keep their homes warm.

Mr. President, I recognize that we are confronted by a situation here which is very serious, and it does seem to me that if it becomes necessary in the future to issue an order of this kind some notice should be given to the public, so that the public may get its house in order. I hope that one or the other of these resolutions will be adopted.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, when I arose a moment ago it appeared as if I did so in response to the inquiry from the senior Senator from Missouri. When he asked, Who is here to speak for the other side—for the administration? There was an appearance, from the fact that I rose spontaneously with that inquiry, as though I arose to assume with my presence that I was directed to speak on the other side of the resolution, "for the administrator," to use the words of the Senator from Missouri. Mr. President, I rise to speak a word or two, but by no direction of anyone, upon the authority of no one, and with no one other than myself, I trust, to bear the responsibility.

Mr. President, when the bill, and particularly section 25, was before this body for the authority which it conferred I said that we would be brought to the point where we must take charge of the coal mines. I said then, to the dismay of many of the distinguished Members of this body, that we would have to take charge of the coal mines as an agency of Government; that the time had come when we should do so upon the theory that the coal mines by nature were mere repositories of elements necessary to the public welfare and ought not longer to be held in private control.

That which has transpired and which has been alluded to this morning is clearly disclosing that the time has come when, under the circumstances surrounding us, this Government should take charge of all coal mines, proceed to supervise coal mining, to control it, and then supervise the distribution of the coal in such manner that no such conditions could be existing, which evidently is the justification for this order, remarkable as it is.

Mr. President, I think we are hastening with some degree of madness this morning. I can understand how any Senator, receiving, as I have this morning, scores and scores of telegrams in relation to this matter, can be aroused in behalf of the interests of his people and that he can readily appreciate the effect that this order must have upon the industries of the State for which he speaks. But there must be some reason for this order. The eminent Senators, both from Nebraska and Ohio, respectively, Senators HITCHCOCK and POMERENE, say it came suddenly, without knowledge, without information. Mr. President, my mind addresses itself to this thought: There must have been some singular and unusual exigency suddenly confronting the Fuel Administrator and the President from which such an order could have been issued; there must be some unusual condition somewhere; there must have arisen suddenly some remarkable circumstance. Surely these men, the President and the Fuel Administrator, are sensible men; it can not be said they are unpatriotic men; it will not be charged that they are foolish men. There must be, sir, some reason so persuasive to their sense of patriotism and duty which called for this immediate action.

Is it not the expression of wisdom, instead of suddenly passing a resolution that on its face condemns what they did, that we pause to consider of them a moment from whom we might obtain information as to why it was done and give them some opportunity by which they may explain to these, the representatives of the Government, before we hastily, in a spirit of almost frenzy, pass a resolution that has for its tenor practically a condemnation of the action, without ourselves knowing the thing that brought it forth or the justification or reasons that might be advanced in its behalf? For myself I concede——

Mr. HITCHCOCK rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska, who indicates a desire to interrupt me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The characterization of the resolution as unfriendly or antagonistic is certainly a great mistake. This resolution is in the nature of a mere request from the Senate; something which is very unusual. It might be made directory, but it is a mere request, and the reason it has got to be done suddenly is that the order has been suddenly issued and goes into effect to-morrow morning. So the request has got to be made at once. If the request goes to the fuel administrator, it is for him to decide whether he will grant it or not. If he grants it, then there will be five days in which he will hear from the country.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, this resolution which has been tendered by the Senator from Nebraska, and which is characterized by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] as expressing, what seemed to him, to be unanimity of view up to that time, at least, to condemn this order, makes only a request, it is true, that this matter go over for five days, and addresses that request of the Fuel Administrator; but if this resolution is passed to-day it will be read by the public in the light of the criticisms which have been made here in the speeches of Senators, and it should be; it will be read in the light of the condemnation expressed, and it should be; and it will be construed as an expression by the Senate of their approval of these condemnations which have been voiced by the respective Senators in support of the resolution.

If this order is without authority, it should be revoked; if it is without justification, it should be promptly withdrawn and reversed; if there are no reasons for it, then it should be condemned; but before action is taken something ought to be done out of ordinary courtesy, in due discharge of that civility which Members of this body are supposed to exhibit in their everyday conduct with common humanity, before we assume a course of action which, in the most ordinary affairs of life, would not have been undertaken by one man against another if they bore the slightest appearance of ordinary friendship, and, Mr. President, what Senators have termed here need of "coordination." It becomes a farcical observation while they in one breath speak about the necessity of coordination in the departments of the Government, and then give to the world the evidence that the Senate, the highest representative branch of the legislative department, has no coordination with the President of the United States in a patriotic duty called for by some public necessity. It will not do for Senators to stand before the country demanding that there should be cooperation, "somebody with responsibility," in order that there shall be execution without confusion, and yet give evidence constantly that in everything that is attempted one branch finds it always agreeable to dissent, to obstruct, to embarrass, to impede, to reverse, to repudiate, to condemn, and in such an instance as this, as I see it, without even a hearing to those of authority who have ordered the course put in effect.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Surely the Senator does not mean to say—and I am calling attention to it because I think he spoke inadvertently—that either branch of Congress has persistently objected and repudiated and refused to concur with the President. The Senator, I do not think, meant to employ language as broad as that. I think there has been a very ready concurrence.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it is my pleasure to say, in certain general war measures, that there has been a very general concurrence and cooperation by both branches in the general measures up to date. I refer, if the Senator will consider the connection, to the effect before the country. It will go forth that Senators can not consistently stand up here demanding "cooperation" and "coordination" and yet fail to recognize the impression they were leaving upon the country of no cooperation or coordination with the President of the United States or his administrative aids.

Mr. President, I do not know, Senators have not been informed, what were the particular conditions and emergencies which made this order necessary. I must assume that there were some; I must take it for granted that they were of a nature to justify it. I can not assume that so sudden an order, with the consequences which Senators here invariably say impend upon their constituencies and upon business, unless there had been some reason for bringing it forth so sufficient as to justify it. Let us find out what they are and let us ascertain from those having the knowledge before we go further.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, Mr. President; I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the fact that on numerous occasions the President of the United States has called Congress to meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives to listen to his views on public questions—some of them of great moment, as I thought; some of them not of very great consequence—is it not a remarkable circumstance that, if this great exigency exists and this drastic action becomes necessary, the President did not follow his usual course and ask Congress to listen to his views on the subject before the order was issued?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I will say to the accomplished and learned Senator from New Hampshire that his inquiry is pertinent, and the reply that I shall make I think is one I can offer as a justification for my position. The Senator is correct that in the great exigencies of government, wherever they have arisen, the President has made it a practice to come before the Congress and explain the conditions and seek action from Congress, certainly seek cooperation. I take it for granted that the exception to which the Senator from New Hampshire alludes would not have arisen unless there were some emergency so sudden, some conditions so unusual, some circumstances so unexpected, that they did not give opportunity for such action on the part of the President. If such be true and upon such considerations this order was issued in such emergency, is it not the part of wisdom that we consider that the reasons must have been most effective, most weighty, and, therefore, instead of passing this resolution at this time, coupled with the animadversions which have been made, should we not consider that such circumstances must have existed and let this resolution go over one day, postpone it, as the rules require, for one day, within which time we may ascertain either from the Fuel Administrator or from the President what particular reason exists, and get from them such views as they may have, and give them such hearing as we would accord to the humblest executive official in any department of this Government before we would pass a resolution surrounded with such criticisms as those with which this resolution has been inflamed?

Mr. President, I do not intimate that Senators should not condemn; I hope that the time may never come when this body will feel so stifled by any form of influence that it will withhold condemnation from anything which it esteems as a wrong; but, Mr. President, I see Senators rise, as did the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from New York, and intimate before the public that what is wrong is the lack of coordination. Lack of it where? I will admit there have been evidences where it has been absent. A war was suddenly precipitated upon us; our people were long accustomed to peace; a conflict without parallel was thrust upon us, and that we could have readily fitted ourselves to such circumstances in a moment, of course, is impossible, and that there would have arisen from time to time evidences of embarrassment is, of course, to be expected; but, Mr. President, I ask the eminent Senators if it would not be well that they allow us to have at the present time that coordination for which they have been asking? They are condemning, unless I misunderstand them, the attitude taken by the Fuel Administrator, who is one of the "responsible heads" of Mr. Hoover, another coordinate head. In what way can you coordinate if men superior in position overthrow and destroy the work of every other department merely for differences of opinion?

What I feel, sir, is necessary is that we cease to assume that there is neglect on the part of the Government; that we cease proclaiming that we have failed in accomplishment, and turn our attention for a moment to the great things we have really done, contemplate the wondrous accomplishments this administration and which the Government at large have performed before the world.

Mr. President, I ask instead of this resolution being passed at this time that it go over for one day, that it be postponed for one day and then be taken up after Senators have become informed of whatever may be the reason for the issuance of the order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That will be too late; the order becomes operative to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, is the Senator from Illinois aware of the fact that the order is to go into effect to-morrow morning?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to make a statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. REED. I think we ought, if possible, before taking action, to know all the facts that can be speedily learned. I am unwilling to pass a resolution on the instant unless that is imperatively necessary, for we might do an injustice; we might make a mistake. I appreciate the gravity of the situation, but I think we can at least wait for the matter of an hour. The Committee on Manufactures have been investigating, through a subcommittee, the question of the coal shortage. Dr. Garfield has been before the committee once and left really with the understanding that he would probably be asked further to testify. He is at the Capitol, and the subcommittee have arranged to have him appear within the next 10 or 15 minutes. We intend to inquire into the reasons of this order, and, if we are so fortunate as to get the Doctor before us and get through, we will try to get through and will report at once to the Senate. Then, the Senate will at least have before it his statement of his reasons. Is not that the better thing to do? I make that statement. We are going ahead with the investigation.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, upon the statement of the Senator from Missouri, I renew—saying that it was not my purpose originally when I rose of being drawn into the discussion to the extent I have taken the time of the Senate—my motion that the consideration of this resolution be postponed at this time, and that it go over for a day. Senators may amend that to meet such time as the Committee on Manufactures feel may serve the purpose and will provide for giving a hearing to the opposite side in some way, a privilege we ordinarily extend to any department of this Government under other circumstances.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the adoption of the motion that the resolution go over for a day would largely defeat its purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Georgia will suspend a moment, the Chair desires to inquire whether the Senator from Illinois has made a motion that the resolution go over or be referred to a committee.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not ask that it be referred, but I ask that it go over until to-morrow morning, so that in the meantime we may obtain information, that we may then be able to take action without doing injustice to those who have not as yet been heard at all and against whom certain Senators threaten speedy judgment without voice or representation. I ask for the postponement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is now recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we have unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution, and it would be utterly unwise, in my judgment, to let it go over until to-morrow. This order goes into effect to-morrow. What we wish is to suspend the immediate operation of the order for further investigation; and, if the order must go into effect eventually, that the industries to be affected may at least have five days in which to prepare for this harsh treatment.

There are some of us who would not object to it going over for an hour, until the Senator from Missouri and his committee can hear Dr. Garfield; but, so far as I am personally concerned, I am ready to vote for it now. I want it passed regardless of what may be said, because I think the order of the Fuel Administrator should at least be suspended for five days, if it is finally to become operative. I think no condition or circumstance justifies such a sudden and complete interference with the industrial world. I can not conceive of an excuse for action without any notice at all, except that which comes from a 24-hour notice. I do not object, if the Senator from Nebraska desires, to having the resolution go over until 3 o'clock or perhaps half past 3, but I hope we will vote upon it and pass it with practical unanimity at a very early hour during to-day's session.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not be precipitated into immediate action upon this resolution. I am not in favor of postponing it until to-morrow morning, for the very good reason assigned by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who has just taken his seat; but I do think that the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the chairman of the committee which has been engaged in investigating this coal situation, ought to be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. President, I agree with the statement that has been several times made upon the floor of the Senate to-day that this order is a public calamity, that the effect of it may be disastrous to the business of the country and to the men who are working in the industries of the country. That, I think, is true; but that does not mean, Mr. President, that there is neither defense nor justification for this order. To my mind there is one justification for it, at least. If it is necessary that this order shall be issued and shall be executed to protect the people of this country, especially those who are herded into the large cities of the country, from freezing, then I consider that a condition exists which makes this order at least defensible and justifiable. I do not wish to see the industries of this country hurt; I do not wish to see this calamity to the industries of this country come upon them; but, Mr. President, the first and a higher consideration than that is that the people of America shall not freeze.

I do not know that any such condition confronts the country. I can not conceive, however, that the responsible people who have issued this order—for if it comes from the Fuel Administration, it comes with the approval of the President—have acted in this summary manner concerning this portentous measure without at least some reasonable justification for their action.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment. With such a condition as I say may confront this country, namely, the necessity of this order to protect the people in the great cities from having to endure the indescribable sufferings of cold—yea, from freezing, Mr. President—if that condition exists, if there is no other way to relieve against that condition except through this action, then we ought not to delay it or suspend it for five days, because, if such a condition as that exists, if this order is suspended for five days, the dire consequences of delay will have overtaken the people. Strong as are the appeals of business to me, the appeals of humanity are immeasurably stronger.

SEVERAL SENATORS. It is a mere request.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know it is a mere request, but it carries with it the sanction of the judgment of the Senate. I believe that before we take this unprecedented action we ought at least to give some time, some opportunity, that the man who has issued this order, with the sanction of the President, may be heard and may present to the Senate the considerations, reasons, and conditions which induced him to make this extraordinary order. We can then express our judgment upon the sufficiency of his grounds.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina now yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it will be an easy matter to harmonize the various views here expressed. I obtained the floor largely through the courtesy of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who had a matter which was coming over from yesterday. I am perfectly willing, if the Senate will grant its consent, to have this matter temporarily laid aside until the question that came over from yesterday, involving the reference of a bill, may be settled, providing the matter shall come before the Senate upon the settlement of this question coming over from yesterady, and in no event later than half past 3.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I would suggest——

Mr. THOMAS. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. KIRBY. I object to laying aside this resolution at the present time.

Mr. THOMAS. I object to the limitation. We want to be heard upon the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON.. I would suggest that under the rule——

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood that I had the floor. I yielded to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Under the rule, when the hour of 2 o'clock comes, this resolution will go to the calendar, will it not, being undisposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be true if there were any unfinished business before the Senate, but there is no unfinished business, and therefore the resolution will remain before the Senate until disposed of.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to say that I shall feel constrained to vote for this resolution unless the Fuel Administrator can convince me, in the testimony that he is now probably preparing to give, if not giving, to the committee, that this order is made necessary by a condition which would be more calamitous to the people of this country that even the temporary suspension of business; but, Mr. President, I am not willing that the Senate should act until the Fuel Administrator has had that opportunity. If we can not in any other way secure a postponement until he has had that opportunity, I think probably we can entertain the Senate in discussing this and other matters until he does have the opportunity to make that explanation. At least, I shall try and see that no final action is taken by the Senate on the resolution until that time has been accorded.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I believe this resolution should be either defeated or withdrawn, and immediately. I think the conditions warrant the action, and it seems to me that the Senate has no right and should not attempt to review an order that was made by authority of law that we agreed to in the first instance.

Senators get up here and talk about this thing as being unprecedented and something that ought not to have occurred. No Senator is charged with the duty of this Fuel Administration, but there is a responsible agency that we have clothed with the power to look after this matter; and here comes an order from it, fully authorized, for this particular thing to be done, and what is asked by the Senate? Not that the order may remain in effect and be enforced; not that the people who are cold may be made warm; not that the 157 ships yonder in the port of New York that can not move without coal may be supplied with coal in order that they may carry the cargoes to our soldiers and allies from that congested port, where millions of tons of freight are already waiting to be carried; but delay only that the Senate may take time to investigate the conditions and ascertain whether the order is necessary. The condition exists. It is not relieved by the fact that in Ohio, as the Senator says, there is enough coal in place to warm the world. The same thing is true in the State of Arkansas. We have wonderful coal deposits down there, too; but the coal is not mined, and it is not in the hands of the consumer, and it is not relieving the condition.

The Fuel Administrator has made this order, and is it to be supposed that he would have made this order for fun? The order has been made with authority, and we are without power to review it.

In the Military Affairs Committee an investigation has been proceeding now for about four or five weeks. I think it has proceeded as long or longer than it is proving beneficial. It probably was beneficial to begin with. It at least has been made and it has been very effective along some lines, but it developed there that the coal condition was bad. It developed there that we had no ships to carry our soldiers and our supplies beyond the sea because we had no coal.

Why could they not shut down the breweries? Why could they not shut down the automobile manufactories and let the coal go where it will promote the winning of the war or promote the interests of the Government in the conduct of the war? That is what several men before our committee have suggested who have been in high position and have made a survey of the resources of this country both in connection with the war and in connection with the fuel supply. That is what some of them suggested ought to be done. They suggested it yesterday and the day before in the Military Affairs Committee—men who are in touch with the conditions and who have made a complete survey of the matter. Do you suppose that the Fuel Administrator, who made this order with the consent and the approval of the President, had not all of this matter in mind, had not all the evidence of this necessity before him when this order was issued?

I am surprised that this sort of a resolution has been introduced in the Senate. The author of it says, "We want a responsible source of centralized power," but when we have a responsible source of centralized power, and that power, after survey made, has acted, then he wants a stay of five days to see whether he was joking about the matter or not, or whether it ought to have been done.

What will a delay of five days amount to? We have been four or five weeks already in the Military Affairs Committee. If it takes five days it will take a month to investigate this thing to the extent that some of them expect it to be done; and afer a while it will be warm weather, and after a while the war will be over and the United States will not have gotten into it. It is about time, when we have granted the power and the agency has acted and expects to do something that we see will be beneficial and will promote the interests of the Government in the conduct of the war, that we let the matter stand as it is, without any review of it and without any delay of it.

I believe this resolution ought to be withdrawn, or if it is not withdrawn it ought to be defeated, and without one minute's delay.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am not insistent that a vote be taken instantly on a matter of this kind; but this resolution is one that must be acted upon very expeditiously if we would delay the effect of the order which has been made.

I very much doubt whether the Fuel Administrator understands the entire reach of this action of his. If some action is not secured by passing this resolution, all the stocks of surplus coal now in the great manufacturing districts of the country can not be burned or converted into any form of useful effort indefinitely. The only sane application of that power, it seems to me, Mr. President, would be by a monitory proclamation that will give the manufacturing and producing interests of this country a chance, by a delay of some reasonable number of days—five days, I believe the resolution provides—to anticipate its enforcement.

Mr. President, I am sure that the Fuel Administrator does not know that thousands of tons of soft coal are piled up in the yards and convenient to the furnaces of the great manufacturing districts of the northern Mississippi Valley. I am sure, too, Mr. President, that the Fuel Administrator does not realize that between now and the 1st day of May 80,000 corn planters and 100,000 reapers must be completed and ready for the corn and small-grain belt of the United States, and that scarcely half of them are made to-day. I repeat what I said here some months ago, that 85 per cent of all the agricultural implements of the world are made within a radius of 200 miles, drawn from Chicago as a center. Of those 80,000 corn planters and 100,000 reapers not more than one-half are made to-day. A majority of all the output of the agricultural implements not only of the United States but of the world are made in the Rock Island, Moline, and adjacent country. They have enough soft coal to run for some time in their factories. They will be instantly paralyzed by this order to-morrow, and at midnight to-night their shifts of hands must cease operation, their furnaces must die, and their unfinished machines must lie idle on the workbench and in their factories.

That is the effect of this order, and by June 1, or earlier in the southern parts of the wheat-producing country, these binders will be needed. Harvesting begins in May in the southern part of the United States. I think they cut about that time in Texas, if I remember rightly, and the harvesting belt moves on northward, and these supplies must be delivered in due season in order to supply the demands of those who require them.

That can not be done; these agricultural implements can not be completed if there is even a five-day delay. If there should be a month's delay, it would be a public disaster. To-day in one area of Illinois more than 10,000,000 bushels of corn are in the field or shock, rotting. It is bad enough as it is, although that is not beyond control. A better season than we have expected might come; cars may be available; the orders issued here may not entirely confiscate grain in the hands of the elevator men, and it is possible that that situation may be relieved; but if, on top of that, you destroy half the output of implements by the agricultural factories, if you destroy the corn planters, the reapers, and the mowers that take care of the grain, the seeding, and the forage in due season, do you think we will raise a record-breaking crop of 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn next year that now is potentially in the soil if you will give the farmers a chance to raise it?

How can it be done if you cut off one-half of the supply of necessary implements? In the four great States that produce corn—Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, and Indiana—in the great wheat-producing States, the winter wheat of the great west and southwestern area, how will they harvest the grain if you stop the production of binders?

This is no idle jest. This is no mere empty-sounding proclamation of some university professor. This means the crippling of our allies in Europe. It means the shortage of our food. It means the discouragement of the farmer, both for corn and for the bread-producing grains of the country. It means the blockade of the manufacturer. There never was a more flagrant instance of the lack of knowledge of one to whom great governmental power has been delegated by the Congress than the issuance of this proclamation by the Fuel Administrator. He has never gauged where this will ultimately land and what its evil effects will be upon the manufacturing industries of the country. The Senate would be justified in delegating no more powers to the executive branch of the Government, or to an appointive officer, if this is an illustration of where and how it is to be used.

I know something of the manufacturing needs of the country, at least the part that is supplied by my own locality. I know, Mr. President, that this order, if put into effect, will be an unmitigated calamity. This resolution proposes a very mild remonstrance, a five-day limitation, merely five days in which these surplus stocks of coal may be consumed, and the manufacturing world may adjust itself to their necessities. Possibly by that time something can be worked out, but it at least possesses the elements of sane and constructive wisdom that we give the five-day limitation embodied in this resolution.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have long heard criticism of Dr. Garfield, the Fuel Administrator, on the ground that he did not do anything. It has come through the press and from the floor of Congress that he did not do anything. It has been claimed that he spent all his time in giving out interviews and issuing proclamations and giving advice to the people and that he accomplished nothing. Now he has done something. It has been claimed that nothing he did amounted to anything. Now he has done something that amounts to something, and what is the result? A storm of criticism and condemnation on the ground that he has exceeded his power and has acted unwisely. He is criticized now because he has done something.

Ever since I have been a Member of this body I have heard a great deal of complaint, constantly growing complaint, about the alleged encroachment of the executive branch of the Government on the legislative branch of the Government. It is a common subject of complaint in Congress. We hear it in this body nearly every day. Yet, it seems to me, there is a constantly manifested disposition of Congress to find fault with all departments of the executive branch of the Government, to criticize them and investigate everything that is done by the executive branch of the Government. To investigate and denounce other branches of the Government seems to be the hobby of Congress. It seems to me that there is a perfect hysteria of investigation of everything that is done these days by the executive branch of the Government and a constant disposition of Congress to criticize what the executive branch of the Government does, to find fault with it, and to claim that Congress knows better how the executive branch of the Government should discharge its duty than does the executive branch itself.

Congress enacted the law under which this order in question is made and conferred the power to do so upon the President of the United States, and he is exercising it. Now the Senate appears dissatisfied because he did what Congress authorized him to do. Reference has been made here to the fact that the powers of the different branches of the Government should be coordinated and exercised by one head. They are coordinated now and executed by one head, by the President of the United States, who is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in time of war. This order of the Fuel Administrator was undoubtedly made with the knowledge and sanction of the President of the United States; in fact and in law, it is the order of the President, and I am not willing to assume that he has acted without thought or ample reason, or that he does not know what he is doing. I believe he knows his business better than we know it.

It has been asked here, if this order is unwise, is Congress so impotent that it can do nothing about it? If this order is unwise and valid, the only thing that Congress could do would be to repeal or amend the law under which the authority was exercised. If the order is invalid, the judicial branch of the Government is the only branch of the Government which has power to remedy or correct the abuse. Congress has no power nor right to usurp the functions of the courts nor to attempt to rectify invalid actions of the executive branch of the Government. Our Government is divided into three branches—the executive, legislative, and judicial—and each is supreme within its own sphere of action. If Congress will attend well to its duties, I believe the executive branch may be trusted to attend to its.

I have no great amount of fault to find with this resolution and none at all with the distinguished author of it, but it seems to me that it is only a part of the general disposition of Congress to find fault with and criticize everything that the executive branch does and to manifest a plain belief that Congress knows better how the executive branch should discharge its duty than does the executive branch of the Government itself; and Congress is not at all slow nor timid about saying so, although I doubt if anybody else agrees with it.

I believe, however, that the best disposition which could be made of this resolution is that suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], that it be postponed for at least a couple of hours, or I would suggest until 5 o'clock this afternoon, for that matter, in order that the subcommittee of which the Senator from Missouri is chairman may have time to investigate the subject and question Dr. Garfield about his reasons for the order, which I am sure the subcommittee will do in a fair way, and report to this body, and then let us act understandingly and know what we are doing. We should have more light before acting. Until then, I reserve my judgment.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to state the parliamentary situation, and then he will recognize the Senator from Rhode Island. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until to-morrow. It has been suggested that that be amended so as to postpone its consideration until 5 o'clock. Does the Senator from Illinois accept that amendment?

Mr. LEWIS. After the observations of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] I will make an announcement to the Senate. In the meantime I will confer with the introducer of the resolution and be able to respond.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What hour did the Chair suggest?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was simply stating the parliamentary situation, that the question before the Senate was the adoption of the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will modify his motion to 4 o'clock, it will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator from Illinois will agree to that.

Mr. LEWIS. I am perfectly willing. My object was to defeat precipitate action. I am only anxious for the length of time necessary.

I am willing to accept the suggestion and to make my motion 4 o'clock and let it be pending at 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until 4 o'clock this afternoon. Is that correct?

Mr. LEWIS. The suggestion I made is the suggestion of the introducer of the resolution.

Mr. HARDING. I do not wish to take the floor, but before the hour is agreed upon, if the resolution is to be effective it ought really to be disposed of by 4 o'clock. I have no desire to hasten consideration, but those who are familiar with industrial methods know that when quitting time comes at night the workmen in the various factories of the land get their instructions or their notification for the morrow. If the resolution is postponed until 5 o'clock——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Four o'clock.

Mr. HARDING. I understand that 4 o'clock does not mean a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At 4 o'clock the resolution will be before the Senate.

Mr. HARDING. I understand that that means its disposition at a later hour, and there will be scores of factories throughout the country closed under the order of the Fuel Administrator and workmen sent home, who will not be expected to return to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the matter can be adjusted. There is now a motion before the Senate providing for the postponement of the resolution until 4 o'clock. Before that time speeches can be made, and when 4 o'clock arrives in all human probability we will be ready to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island will proceed.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, when I rose I understood the parliamentary situation to be that a motion had been made to postpone the resolution until 3 o'clock. Unanimous consent was asked and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] objected. I rose to urge that the Senator would not insist on that objection, because I felt that the situation was such a serious one to the country at large, and also to my own State, that we should have the fullest information before we voted on the resolution. I am very glad that I misunderstood the parliamentary situation, and that now we are to hear from the committee the statement of Mr. Garfield as to why the order was made.

Of course, an order of this sort is bound to have a far-reaching effect, and while I yield to no one in a sincere desire to see everything done for our allies and for the carrying on of this war, I can not help but feel that an order so sweeping as this, which does not hold back the supply of coal for industries perhaps not absolutely necessary, but which touches all industries, is of such a character that at least the Senate of the United States is entitled to farther information, and is within its rights when it asks that due consideration be given before the order goes into effect. I know in my own State how serious the coal situation is, how important is the work that it is doing for the armies of the United States and for the carrying on of the war. I appreciate how necessary it is to keep these industries going; and not only that, but also how essential it is to have the people know that the Government of the United States is acting wisely and for their interest and for the benefit of the entire country.

In a time like this, Mr. President, when the cost of living is naturally so high from war conditions, it means a great deal to the man in the factory if he loses his day's work. It means a great deal if many people are thrown out of employment. As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] said, that has a psychological effect on the entire country.

I do not believe that any step should be taken that in any way puts the people of the different great industrial centers out of work unless it is absolutely necessary for carrying on of the war; and if it is absolutely necessary for carrying on the war, then I know the people of my State will gladly and willingly make as great sacrifices as any people in the Union, for I feel that we are doing our share, and that Rhode Island bows to no State in its patriotism and in its desire to win the war.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in its general aspect this subject is not a complex one. In the present emergency it appears to me to be quite a simple proposition. We will have two months of weather where it will be necessary to furnish coal to warm the people in the United States. Now, that is our first thought. The question, then, which appeals to most of us is this: Is there coal enough or is there transportation enough to furnish both the people in their homes with the necessary quantity and also to run every character of industry? If there is not, and if there is not a sufficient quantity of coal mined to supply these requirements, or if the railroads under their new management can not distribute what there is in sufficient quantities to meet the demand, then we are brought up simply to this one question: Shall the people be kept warm, or shall unnecessary industries be operated? As between the two I would have no difficulty in deciding that the theater and the moving-picture show and others of a like character could well wait; that even the manufacture and sale of automobiles could wait until the people have sufficient coal to keep their homes warm and fit to live in.

I shall hope that whoever has charge of this matter and who desires to postpone it until 4 o'clock this afternoon will ascertain whether it is possible with the present railroad equipment, even under the management of a dictator, to furnish coal to the people. If there is not enough for both them and the industries, it seems to me that we will have little difficulty in supporting what the Director or Coal Administrator has done so far. It is not a question of criticizing him for what he has done or what he has failed to do in the past. We are up against a situation, as I view it, and it seems to me that we have got to meet it, no matter whether the administration has run this arm of the Government skillfully or whether it has done otherwise. We can not wait to decide that. We must decide to-day, it seems to me, whether or not we will support an order to the effect that certain of the industries must cease operation until the people are assured of sufficient coal to last them during the winter.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, during the last session the legislation that conferred this power on the Executive was before this body. Certain Members of the Senate, on both sides of it, objected very strenuously, regarding the conferring of these powers as wholly unnecessary. But the Senate in its wisdom determined to grant these powers, and did grant these powers to the Executive of the country. Section 25 of the food-control act provides—

> That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, whenever and wherever in his judgment necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to fix the price of coal and coke, wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer, to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the method of production, sale, shipment, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among dealers and consumers, domestic or foreign.

Then provision is made that authority may be exercised through the Federal Trade Commission.

I can not find, on a somewhat cursory examination of the statute, where the President got the authority to appoint Mr. Garfield, although Senators who served on the committee and helped to frame this legislation insist it is somewhere else in the law; and it must be, since Mr. Garfield was appointed and is exercising this power under the President.

The Senate thought it necessary to confer these powers, and, exercising its constitutional function as a part of the law-making power of the Republic, it gave to the Executive this power. Personally I thought it was a mistake. Personally I do not believe it was necessary. Personally I voted against it. I do not believe that any one man, however wise or however strong, could possibly run the great business industries of this Republic with any degree of safety, satisfaction, or success, and I believe we had better rely on the ordinary processes of business and the ordinary methods of business to keep our country strong and adequate and able to successfully prosecute the war.

Congress, however, adopted the other view. It delegated this power—greater power, I think, over business than was ever before delegated in a free land in the history of the world—to the President of the United States. Now, when the President of the United States has exercised this power that we told him to exercise according to his own judgment and to his own discretion and to his own view of the situation, at its very first exercise we go to complaining, like a lot of schoolboys, without knowing the facts, without knowing what the necessity is for this order. It is not a safe thing to do. It is not a wise thing to do, and, if Senators will pardon me, it is not a patriotic thing to do.

If it was necessary to confer this power at all, and you said it was, certainly you ought not to complain at its exercise unless you are certain there has been abuse on the part of the Executive in the exercise of the power that we conferred.

The Senate, if this resolution is to be adopted, puts itself in a remarkable position. It humbly petitions an official it did not confirm, holding an office and not responsible to it, to postpone or revoke an order that he did not pass, except as the mere subordinate of the official whose agent he is.

Where we should legislate, we humbly petition; where we should command, we humbly beg, hat in hand.

There is no useful purpose to be served by adopting this resolution. If we were right when we passed legislation of this sort we must trust to the Executive to do the right thing or face the other alternative frankly and repeal the law. Why should this body petition a subordinate official of the Government, who has no legal existence, who does not hold an office created by law, but who acts as a mere agent of the President, to suspend or revoke an order that he has issued or has procured the President to make?

I say, in the first place, as a matter of correct procedure, if the resolution is to be adopted at all, if it is the judgment of the Senate that it ought to prevail, it should be directed to the President of the United States, to whom we delegated this power; to the President of the United States, upon whom we conferred this authority, and not upon some agent whom he has selected to help him in the exercise of his executive duties.

I say, in the second place, if we are going to pass legislation of this character, giving these people all sorts of power over the business and industry and the lives and the happiness of our people, when they exercise it it is useless as well as undignified in us to complain.

Some Senator has humorously suggested on this side that the proposition in a nut shell amounts to notice to the administration that if it does not quit enforcing some of these fool laws that we have enacted we will repeal them. That is about what it comes to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator from Illinois modified his motion.

Mr. LEWIS. I accepted the suggestion making the hour 4 o'clock, which, I understood, met the approval of the mover of the resolution, the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is satisfactory to me. I merely inquired if the Senator had modified his motion.

Mr. LEWIS. I am going to accept the suggestion for the purpose stated by the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from Missouri having announced that there was a hearing proceeding.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has been agreed by us that the consideration of this matter shall be postponed until 4 o'clock, if that is agreeable to the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to inquire whether the motion contemplates that the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] shall be disposed of in the interim.

Mr. LEWIS. For myself I may say to the able Senator from Colorado that I have not comprehended the motion of the Senator from Virginia at all. That was not in the consideration of any motion I made.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I do not object to it. I do not think there will be time to consider the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] to postpone the consideration of the resolution until 4 o'clock.

On a division the motion was agreed to.

NAVAL OIL SUPPLY.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I submitted to the Senate several days ago a motion to refer Senate bill 3521, introduced by me, in reference to the naval reserve oil lands, to the Naval Committee for consideration. I renew that motion.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. We had better have a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum, and the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smoot
Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
Culberson	Kirby	Poindexter	Swanson
Curtis	Knox	Ransdell	Thomas
Fernald	Lewis	Robinson	Tillman
Gerry	McCumber	Saulsbury	Townsend
Gore	McKellar	Shafroth	Trammell
Gronna	McNary	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Harding	Myers	Sherman	Watson
Hardwick	Nelson	Simmons	Wolcott

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] are detained on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of sickness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only 44 Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, and Mr. SMITH of Maryland answered to their names when called.

Mr. FLETCHER entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to refer this bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, in my judgment, not only disregards all precedents hitherto observed but it also, if adopted, will deprive the Committee on Public Lands of its jurisdiction of one of the most important bills which has been or will be introduced in this Congress. I do not think that such a motion should be adopted by the Senate in the absence of some overpowering reason or necessity, and not then if it can be properly and fairly handled by the committee to which it ought to go.

We are doing a great many things nowadays, Mr. President, under the assumption that they are essential to the common defense and general welfare. No doubt many of these things are so in their nature and operation. On the other hand, human nature, which seldom changes, busies itself now, as ever, in assuming the shelter of a popular purpose for much proposed legislation which, appearing under such a title, only assumes to deceive. Scarcely a bill is now introduced but that a part of its title proclaims it as "an act to provide for the common defense and for the general welfare." Whether it be a bill to increase a pension or to remove the disabilities of some deserter who wants a pension; whether it be a new extension of our river and harbor system or for any other purpose, it is apt to come here disguised as an essential to the general defense and bound to promote the public welfare.

This bill in its essence would seem to be exempt from the criticism which I have just made; but when we consider the circumstances surrounding it and the fact that the immediate purpose is not that expressed in the title of the bill, I think it is subject to the ban. It does not provide for the common defense and the general welfare any more than other bills that have been introduced here affecting the public domain.

Why do I say that? First, Mr. President, because there is and there has been no intention on the part of the Secretary of the Navy and those who advise him to immediately develop these naval reserves, and if I were mistaken about that fact—which I am not—it would be scarcely possible, unless this war lasts much longer than we all hope it may, to carry these reserves, with the possible exception of reserve No. 1, to that degree of development which would make their stores of oil available in the present emergency.

Some time ago an oil man of experience and capacity, and who, notwithstanding that fact, is a patriot, suggested to the Navy Department the propriety of opening the reserve in Wyoming, the oil there being some 1,500 miles from the nearest seaboard, and exchanging it after production upon terms to be stated by the Navy Department for oil at the coast. He was told very vigorously, if I can judge from the way we treat witnesses now, and particularly in committee, by pounding a desk or table while you are propounding the questions, that no such proposal would be considered. This gentleman was informed that these reserves were designed to be kept practically in perpetuam or until the presence of some great emergency made it necessary to use them. They are to be conserved, preserved, and massaged for future generations. It was suggested by this gentleman that there was something of an emergency just at present before the United States, but the officials to whom he was referred, if judged by their actions, did not seem to think so.

I know of no greater emergency, Mr. President, that can confront this Nation than the one which now confronts it, except it be the day of judgment, at which time the oil in these reserves will be needed, if at all, for the cremation of those who in the final division are assigned to that portion of humanity denominated as the goats. [Laughter.]

If I am mistaken, Mr. President, about my assertion that there is no present intention of developing these reserves, I hope I may be corrected, because I do not wish in opposing this motion to base my opposition upon any fact or any situation which does not exist. If it be that these are reserves in perpetuity, how can the present welfare and common defense of the Nation be conserved by any provision or all of the provisions of this bill? If they can not, then what emergency exists which would justify our reversal of precedent and sending the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, instead of to the Committee on Public Lands?

The Senator from Virginia the other day, when he offered his motion, gave as an additional reason why the Senate should comply with his request that the bill should go to a committee that is friendly. He said:

> If the Senate is friendly to the protection of the naval reserves and desires them to be used for the benefit of the Navy, and it has the authority to refer bills to suit itself, the proper committee to have jurisdiction of the bill under the rules and precedents of the Senate is the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. President, that is a new reason for departing from our customs and our rules. We must hereafter, if the argument is to prevail with the majority of the Senate, before referring a bill, in order to be consistent, ascertain what particular committee of the Senate is friendly to the measure, and, having so ascertained, then, without regard to the normal jurisdiction of committees, send it there.

I am quite willing, Mr. President, that this argument shall prevail here, providing that it be understood that we thereby set a precedent for the future. I have introduced several bills in this body, and thus far have not been very successful in securing their discussion.

If I might have sent them to a friendly committee, I might have secured an immediate favorable report. For example, for some time I was the chairman of the Committee on Woman Suffrage, and a number of land bills which I introduced could easily have been reported out and placed upon the calendar if they had been referred to that committee; but the idea had never occurred to me, until it was presented by the junior Senator from Virginia, that the mental attitude of a committee was a determining test for the reference of bills introduced here; and the very fact that the distinguished Senator resorted to such an assertion—I will not call it an argument, because the Senator does not do me the honor to be present during my discussion of his motion, possibly because its fate is already determined—involves the admission that the bill should be consigned to friendly hands if it were to be favorably reported. But the suggestion involves a sort of reflection upon the committee to which this bill should go; it carries an inference, at least, that the Committee on Public Lands is unfriendly to the bill. That I deny, Mr. President. Although I am not a member of that committee, I think I know in general the views which a majority of the members of that committee entertain regarding this bill. I agree with the sentiment which inspires many of its members and which is disposed to protect and conserve the interests and ownership of bona fide locations made by citizens of the United States, which are involved and imperiled by this proposed measure.

I might retort and say that there is not only no friendship for this class of men in the minds of a majority of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, but that their attitude is one of distinct hostility. If friendship for a bill is to be a controlling influence in the determination of a motion like this, it should not be a one-sided friendship, because otherwise not friendship but partiality would be the controlling factor. It is worse than partiality; it is prejudice as to some of the features of the measure and some of the interests to be affected by it. So that I hope the Senate, notwithstanding the fact that most of its Members are absent from their seats, will hesitate before they act finally upon an important measure of this sort for the reasons assigned by the mover of it and in its behalf.

It has been said, however, that this is not a bill which normally should go to the Committee on Public Lands, because it concerns naval reserves heretofore created by Executive order and for naval purposes. Why, Mr. President, the fact that the bill concerns reserves made and designated for a particular purpose certainly can not affect the broad question involved in the pending motion. Suppose that the President should to-morrow by proclamation set aside all of the spruce-timber lands on the public domain for the use of the aviation division of the War Department, would it be said that because of the purpose designed to be subserved by the reservation the Committee on Military Affairs would therefore be the appropriate one to consider either the question of the reservation itself or the rights based upon or growing out of it?

Once upon a time Congress either seriously considered or actually made—my memory is not clear as to which—a reservation of all public lands growing live-oak trees for the use of the Navy, the idea being to conserve that kind of timber for what was supposed to be an essential element of the public defense and the general welfare. I do not know to what committee that bill was referred, if indeed it was referred at all, but I am very sure that if then a Committee on Public Lands existed no one would have for a moment suggested that the bill should go somewhere else; and I may say in passing, Mr. President, that there was just about as much necessity for such legislation in the early days of the last century as there is at the present time for the creation of these naval reserves.

Neither is in anywise essential—I will not say "desirable"—but neither is in anywise essential for any purpose to be subserved by the Navy now or in the immediate future. If the case were otherwise, Mr. President, I would be the last man to stand here and waste the time of the Senate and of the public in opposing this motion.

However, this is not the time to discuss the merits of the bill, except in so far as that discussion is pertinent to the motion to refer. What does this bill propose to do? The first section declares:

> That the absolute title and right of possession to any oil or gas lands within the exterior boundaries of naval petroleum reserve No. 1 in California, as defined and established by Executive order dated September 2, 1912, naval petroleum reserve No. 2 in California, as defined and established by Executive order dated December 13, 1912, and naval petroleum reserve No. 3 in Wyoming, as defined and established by Executive order dated April 30, 1915, together with any oil and gas wells, machinery, equipment, appliances, and other property on, useful for, and incidental to the production, storage, transportation, refining, use, protection, and conservation of oil and gas on or in connection with said lands shall become vested in the United States upon the issuance from time to time by the President of an Executive order or proclamation to that effect—

And so forth.

I doubt, Mr. President, if a bill containing a clause at all analogous to the one to which I have just referred has ever been introduced in Congress. In one certainly, and in two probably, of these naval reserves are large bodies of land, the title to which belongs to private citizens, either individuals or corporations or both. They are as fully the absolute owners of their premises as, Mr. President [Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair], are you the owner of realty the title to which in the State of Washington stands upon the records in your name. They have acquired this property by an observance of the laws under which such title was derived; they have doubtless paid taxes, State, county, and local, upon it; but this bill, by an edict without precedent in the history of American or Anglo-Saxon legislation, by the proclamation of the President of the United States, proposes to wipe out those titles as absolutely and completely as though they never existed.

I assume from what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] said during the discussion of yesterday, that he is rather inclined to favor the reference of this bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I want to inquire, now that he is in the Chamber, inasmuch as this bill by legislative edict proposes to destroy private vested titles in fee simple, whether he does not think there is something in the measure which justifies our resistance to the sending of it to a committee professedly so friendly as to justify the impression that it will be reported out at once for passage without amendment. The Senator from Georgia has been Secretary of the Interior in his time, and made one of the ablest and most competent officials who ever adorned that high position. I do not believe that in his wide experience in public or in private affairs he ever encountered a proposed measure containing such a provision.

But it might be said that the Committee on Public Lands has nothing to do with private titles; I concede that, for the sake of the argument; but there are other titles, Mr. President, not ripened yet into titles in fee simple, but titles that are descendable under the statute; titles which are taxable under the laws of California and Wyoming; titles, Mr. President, which have been acquired by citizens of the United States through a careful and religious observance of every requirement of the public law; titles which have been acquired through hardship and suffering and hazard of life and limb, through the expenditure of large sums of money, in the hope of finding treasure; titles recognized in the proclamation of withdrawal by President Taft, and entitled to protection, independent of such recognition, which this bill proposes to wipe out absolutely, without so much as giving the owner a hearing anywhere, except in the future, before the courts where the constitutionality of this measure must necessarily be tested, and which, in turn, involves renewed expense, delay, trouble, anxiety, and possible defeat.

The Senator from Virginia is an eminent lawyer; and I put it to him whether he ever before heard of such a thing as an attempt by a bill to wrest vested property from citizens of the United States, and, by the edict of the Executive, based upon the provisions of the act, to relegate that owner to the remedy of accepting what the Government afterwards sees fit to pay or going into the courts for the establishment of his rights. It is monstrous.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. This bill provides the same procedure that is provided where steel is commandeered, where land is commandeered, or where any other property is taken by the Government. It is precisely the same method of procedure that Congress has authorized repeatedly, without any objection on the Senator's part, as far as I know. It is drawn as far as possible in such a way as to give to the Navy Department and the War Department all the usual powers to take private property for public use.

What does the bill provide? That the President of the United States—as was provided in the naval bill and, as I understand, in the military bill—can offer these people a certain amount of money for their property and their rights. If they see fit to accept it, it is paid to them. If they do not see fit to accept it, 75 per cent of the amount is paid to them in cash, and they have a right to go to the district court where the land is located, according to the law existing to-day, and have their rights litigated by the court.

I should like to ask the Senator why the people of these oil lands have any higher rights, any higher privileges, than people that have other property? We do not take from them anything that has not been taken from other people. We do not increase their rights, and we do not decrease them, under the law. I have always insisted, and I do not see why anybody else should insist further, that these people should be treated precisely like other citizens who own lands and have claims that the Government wants to take for public use. They should be paid, and this method of procedure is precisely the same method that is provided in other cases.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I must differ from my distinguished friend, much as I respect his legal erudition and his legislative experience. I concede that in times of war the Government may stretch out its hand and, for the existing emergency, seize personal property and occupy real property, and that it is the sole judge of the necessity prompting such action. But I deny that the Government has at any time in all its history, I deny that any State government under it has at any time in all its history, by legislative enactment declared that the absolute title to real estate held in private ownership shall be vested by proclamation in the Government of the United States or in the State, as the case may be, and I defy contradiction of this assertion. I know that the Government has frequently taken property for its own purposes, but always through processes of condemnation, through a recognition of the right of the citizen to obtain, not the compensation which the President sees fit to offer, but the compensation which a commission or a jury shall determine after a full investigation.

Here, however, for all time, in the absence of any emergency justifying it, we propose in this bill to say by law that the premises of John Smith shall no longer be his premises, but when the proclamation of the President issues he shall cease absolutely to be an owner, and by virtue of the law and the proclamation his title is wiped out as completely as it would have been under the old common law under an act of attainder, the only difference being that the Navy Department, acting for the President, may offer a certain amount of money after it has taken this property without any hearing at all, and then say to the despoiled owner: "Take that or nothing, unless you can get more in the courts. If you deny the justice and equity of the price offered, take 75 per cent of it and litigate the remainder." In other words, he must take 75 per cent and spend it all, it may be, in litigating with the Government over the actual value of the property of which he has been despoiled and in waiting through the weary years that intervene between the institution of the litigation and its final determination in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, all of this land belongs either to the Government or to private individuals. This bill provides that where there is an uncertainty, and where people have spent money that they might not have had a legal, technical right to spend, the President is authorized under the circumstances, even though the Government may have a right to the property, to pay them what it thinks right and proper under the circumstances. If those people see fit not to take that, then they go to the district court where the matter pends, just as they do when land is condemned for the Navy. We have seized land here and put the Government in possession, and afterwards fixed the price, and let them go to court to get the balance if they were not satisfied.

Mr. THOMAS. May I interrupt there? You were required before doing that to endeavor to come to a private agreement with the owner, failing in which you could take possession by making a deposit and then proceeding in court.

Mr. SWANSON. The Government proposes to do that, not only in this case, but it did it in the case of land in various places where navy yards were needed, where the land had to be taken at once. These wells are being operated frequently to the detriment of the Government. The Government needs the oil. The Government can not wait until the termination of long litigation to seize them and do this. The Government takes the property and leaves it to the courts to determine the title and the amount of value. That is all that is done. It is done in every other case.

Why should these people have any special privileges over anybody else? I can cite cases where it has been done for navy yards. The Government was put in possession and authorized to pay a certain price. If the owners did not accept it, the Government could pay them 75 per cent cash, and they went to the courts, precisely as in this case, and got more if the courts so determined. This is not a special case in that respect.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator can not lay his finger upon a single act of Congress—if he can, I will vote to refer this bill to the Naval Affairs Committee—where the title to the real estate taken for navy-yard purposes was by legislative enactment and Executive edict declared to be in the Government of the United States. Every lawyer knows the proceedings to be followed in the exercise of the right of eminent domain: First, the public need which requires the condemnation; second, the attempt to arrive amicably and without litigation at an agreement as to value; third, the payment of that value before taking possession; fourth, failing to agree, then the deposit of a sum assumed by the court to be the fair equivalent of the value in the hands of the court itself for the benefit of the owner, followed by possession; fifth, the appointment of a jury or of a commission in an appropriate proceeding for the purpose of determining the question of value.

The Senator asks why these people should be treated better than other people owning other kinds of real estate. My complaint is that they are not treated as well, that they are treated far worse, that they are having their property confiscated in advance without their day in court; and the Senator overlooks the fact that much of this property is owned in fee simple absolutely, not a possessory right, but a right based upon the solemn transfer by the Government of the United States of its title to them because of their observance of all preliminary requirements.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, when the appropriation bill was pending here at the last session, the Government was very anxious to get a naval base at Norfolk, without waiting for the title to be settled. In that appropriation bill, if I undersand it correctly, and I think I do, the officers of the Government were authorized to go and take possession of the land, which they did immediately, make an offer to the men that owned the land——

Mr. THOMAS. Exactly.

Mr. SWANSON. If they did not accept the offer, pay them 75 per cent of it——

Mr. THOMAS. Exactly.

Mr. SWANSON. And then, if they were not satisfied—the Government meanwhile being put in possession of the property, and the vested title being put in the Government—then if the people were not satisfied with what was offered they were entitled, precisely as in the case of this bill, to go into court and have a jury, as this bill provides, to determine the title as between themselves and other individuals and what was a fair price.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am familiar with that particular legislation. It was opposed because there seemed to be no provision for ascertaining values in advance and giving the owner his day in court. I suggested during the discussion that, inasmuch as the bill provided for condemnation proceedings "according to law," and inasmuch as the statutes of the State of Virginia made provision for condemnation proceedings, the course to be followed was as required by those statutes. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] rose in his seat and made the statement that such was the fact; that these laws did exist; and that under them the proceedings would be instituted. The Senator's illustration is unfortunate for his argument, because it does not support it. On the contrary, it strengthens mine. I contend that never in the history of this country were titles confiscated by an act of the Congress, supplemented with an Executive edict.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, this bill provides, if I mistake not, precisely as that bill provided——

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SWANSON (continuing). That it should be determined by the district court of the district where the land is located; but, anyway, that is a question that can be determined when the bill comes up on its merits. If it is thought proper to have the amount limited, or that the delay shall come in this matter after the value has been ascertained, whether that should be prior or later, is a very proper thing to discuss when the bill is considered on its merits.

Mr. THOMAS. I agree to that, Mr. President.

Mr. SWANSON. Whether it is wiser to put the title in the Government now or to wait until these condemnation proceedings have been conducted in the district court, and let the value be fixed, and then let the title be vested afterwards, is a question of policy on the part of the Congress; and, so far as that is concerned, it is a matter that is not very material. The Senator will have an opportunity to offer an amendment in that respect. The question here is, To which committee shall this bill be referred to finally dispose of it, perhaps to change the bill entirely by amendment, and to consider the disposition of the measure?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, unfortunately the Senator from Virginia did not honor me with his presence during the first part of my discussion. During his absence I called attention to the fact that among the reasons assigned by him for disposing of this bill according to his motion was the assertion that it ought to go to a friendly committee, presupposing the Naval Affairs Committee to be friendly at least to the naval reserve side of the bill, and that the Committee on Public Lands was unfriendly to it. I wished to and did point out some of the things to which the committee would be friendly, which in my judgment should never disfigure any bill, whether referring to the public lands or otherwise. In saying that I make no possible reflection upon the good faith of the Senator or his capacity to draw the bill. I think that in his zeal he has overlooked a condition here which, when accompanied and supplemented by the friendship of the committee to which he wishes it to go, may result not only in great hardship, but even in the defeat of the bill itself.

It rather grieved me to hear the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] a morning or two ago practically condemn all claimants to the right of possession under locations of any of the premises included within the boundaries of these reserves, forsooth because some scoundrel or scoundrels taking advantage of the letter of the law had defied its spirit in making spurious locations. Mr. President, you can not possibly exclude the unscrupulous and the adventurer from taking advantage of activities produced by the energies and the expenditures of honest men and seeking to profit by them in the making of spurious locations. You can not exclude scoundrels from any adventure which honest men may have followed and developed to the point of profit. They are bound to use every possible method whereby they can enjoy some of the prosperity and the profits thus ensuing. But it is not right, Mr. President, because such individuals exist and are perniciously active, to condemn everybody connected with the same enterprise or engaged in the same line of business.

I have known professors of the Christian religion occasionally to fall from grace. I pretend to no particular advocacy of Christianity, but I certainly would not condemn an entire denomination because of the scoundrelism of some of its members, however prominent they might be. I have no right to speak for the Committee on Public Lands; but, knowing the men who compose it, I am justified in saying that not one of them wants to do anything to further the fraudulent schemes, the dishonest locations, or the fictitious claims of any man or set of men. But, thank God, they have not reached the point in their opposition where they are willing to include in their general condemnation the men who have honestly and lawfully and conscientiously taken advantage of the opportunities offered by the statutes of their country, and but for whose energies, risks, and expenditures there would be no naval reserves in the West or anywhere else. As the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] suggests, the Government would forever and ever have remained ignorant of the tremendous values concealed in the bosom of these desert hills, the outpouring of which is entirely due to the men who have incurred not only the displeasure but the suspicion of the officials of the Government of the United States, or many of them. It is absolutely wrong; it is unjust; it is cruel; and I predict here and now that if this policy continues the further development of the vast public domain of the United States will cease and its progress in settlement and in the opening of its resources will be permanently halted.

A little while ago some adventurous gentlemen, good citizens of my State, risked large sums of money in prospecting for oil in a region which had been condemned by the Geological Survey of the United States. They discovered a magnificent treasure of oil, and within less than 30 days the Government of the United States, through the Executive and by the advice and direction of the departments, withdrew this land from public occupation and development. I once heard a story of a woman who, aftering retiring, told her husband she thought she heard a burglar. "Well," he said, "my dear, let him hunt, and if he finds anything we will take it away from him." [Laughter.]

The Government of the United States is not a burglar, but it acts nowadays upon the husband's suggestion. It invites its citizens to explore the public domain, and if they find anything it then proceeds to take it away from them. If that policy had been followed in the good old days when Kentucky was a part of the Old Dominion, and in the days that followed our acquisition of the Louisiana Purchase, this magnificent Republic would still be confined in its population and energies to the Atlantic seaboard.

It was not a crime then, nor a disgrace, nor an act of treason or lack of patriotism, for men with their families to blaze the way through the trackless forests of the Mississippi Valley, to penetrate far beyond the fringe of civilization and of settlement, and redeem from the intolerant forces of nature that magnificent section of the United States upon which the Republic to-day depends for victory in this, the greatest war of the centuries. Thank God, there is one committee of the Senate which is still friendly and tolerant of that spirit which settled the West, and which, if left untrammeled, will furnish all the oil that this country and its allies need, even though this war should last for a century, the supply of which now is limited because of the restrictions placed by the Government upon its own resources. Do you wonder, then, that we feel that this measure should not take a course out of the regular order of references, but that it should go to the committee to which it naturally would be referred in the absence of the Senator's motion?

Mr. President, we of the West are very proud of the American Navy, even though we live in the heart of the continent, and many thousands of feet above the level of the sea. We entertain for it the same affection which inspires the distinguished member of the Naval Affairs Committee. We differ as to details, perhaps; but, nevertheless, our regard for this tremendous arm of the service is quite as extensive and as enthusiastic as that which prevails elsewhere. Within the past two or three years I have undertaken the pleasant task of vindicating the Secretary of the Navy from many of the aspersions cast upon him and at times when but few, if any, voices were heard from the members of the Naval Affairs Committee in his behalf. I mention this now merely to emphasize my assertion that I am prompted by no feeling of prejudice or disregard of the rights or interests of the Navy in asking that this motion be rejected.

I come now to another phase of the discussion.

Mr. President, this last naval reserve, if I remember the phraseology of the order, was created without any reservations whatever. This bill, if it becomes a law, will not only practically destroy by confiscation the possessory and fee-simple titles of individuals, leaving them afterwards to determine by court proceedings what they ought to get, but it will also destroy the interests which the public still have by virtue of express law in these reserves, without making any compensation whatever to them.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think he is mistaken as to the main purposes of this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I think not.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand the bill, there might be an amendment to section 1 making an exception so far as claimants are concerned; but section 5 of the bill seems to entirely eliminate the impression that the Senator has in reference to the bill. Section 4 authorizes the President to compromise with all claimants in this naval reserve. Section 5 provides that in case of disagreement as to title or value the Attorney General is directed to start condemnation proceedings in the district court.

Mr. THOMAS. That is a conflict in terms. The bill says that upon proclamation of the President the Government shall become the absolute owner of everything personal and real upon these reserves.

Mr. SWANSON. And it becomes subject to condemnation proceedings; but an amendment could be inserted, and I would not object to it, providing that they shall lose the title except where there are disputed private claims. I have no objection to an amendment of that kind being put in, and letting the condemnation proceed as in other cases, if it is not already in the bill. I have always stated that these people were entitled to the same privileges and the same rights, no more and no less, that belonged to other people.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator's contention is perfectly sincere. Unfortunately there is a vast difference between his contention and his bill.

Mr. SWANSON. There would be no trouble whatever except where there are private claims. An amendment could be made to the first section, and then those people would have the benefit of condemnation proceedings under section 5 precisely as they do in other cases.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, of course an amendment of that kind would put a slight sugar coating upon the pill, but it would be extremely bitter nevertheless. The United States is a great country. We all love it. We love to speak well of it, but as a debtor it is one of the most dishonest institutions in the world. The Government does not pay its honest debts to its citizens, and every man and every woman within the sound of my voice knows that to be true. We can pass pension bills ad libitum, because the beneficiaries vote; we can erect public buildings in every little crossroads in the country, and by that means we can make capital for the next election; but when it comes to paying the claims of honest creditors the Government fights harder and longer than anybody. Even after the Court of Claims gives judgment for the citizen he must still run the gauntlet of the Committee on Claims and then of the Congress. He starts with abundant and rosy hopes, and he generally ends by burial in the paupers' graveyard.

It is all well enough to relegate these poor fellows to the tender mercies of a condemnation court. Of course, we will take that if we can get nothing better; but I protest, Mr. President, that it is not right to compel the citizens of the United States to follow such a course and then be dependent upon the charity of the Government as to what amount may be paid; and, as suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], many of these claimants have practically spent all the money that they had and all that they could beg, borrow, or steal in the effort to establish their claims and protect their reputations against the prejudices and charges of wrongdoing which the Government seems to make or to entertain.

Mr. SWANSON. I will state the information I have from the papers is vastly different from that.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. SWANSON. The information I have is that they spent in all about $3,000,000, and have about $7,000,000 already of the aggregate claims there.

Mr. THOMAS. You can not judge a general situation by one or two instances. In the Cripple Creek mining district, in my State, there are 19,000 locations of so-called mines, and out of them less than 15 that ever paid a dividend. There are ownerships by a fee-simple title, ownerships by location and the observance of the requirements of the laws of the United States, but the vast majority of these other claims are held in and by virtue of that hope for values which is the constant inspiration of the prospector and of the miner, without which we would have no mining industry in this country. There are two or three owners of claims within the naval reserves who have made some money, most of which is impounded by the Government. But how about the vast army which up to this time have not been successful, many of whom would have secured oil long since but for governmental interference?

Mr. President, this is in some degree a digression, prompted by the Senator's criticism. My purpose, if I can, is to present the reasons why the Committee on Public Lands should have control of this bill and why the motion of the Senator from Virginia should be denied, and in doing that to draw attention to the contents of the bill which actually invoke the jurisdiction of that committee or at least fall under the purposes for which it was organized.

In the first place, let me say that these reservations are permanent, at least the one in Wyoming is permanent, if I remember the phraseology of the President's proclamation; but under the provisions of the only existing law on the subject, the Pickett Act, the President is authorized in his discretion to "temporarily withdraw from settlement, location, sale, or entry any of the public lands of the United States."

There is no executive power since the passage of that act to create a permanent reserve upon the public domain for any purpose upon earth. But by section 2—and I am indebted to my colleague for calling my attention to this—it is provided that "the lands withdrawn under the provisions of this act shall at all times be open to exploration, discovery, occupation, and purchase under the mining laws of the United States, so far as the same applies to minerals other than coal, oil, gas, and phosphate." In other words, under the law under which the last reserve was created, and I think all of them——

Mr. SMOOT. All of them.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Utah says all of them—any citizen of the United States may go upon them and prospect for gold, silver, lead, cinnabar, zinc, copper, and no man has the legal right to say him nay. Upon these naval reserves that right exists, yet this bill proposes to destroy, without compensation, that right which inheres to-day in every man who claims an allegiance to this Government.

How can it be contended, in the face of such a condition, that the Committee on Public Lands should not have control of this bill? I am glad they are friendly to the prospector. To paraphrase the argument of my distinguished friend from Virginia, let me say the bill should go to a friendly committee, and friendliness to him is more important in this matter than any other consideration, for I must contend that there is no emergent condition confronting the Navy; that these reserves are not designed for immediate consumption; and hence there is no necessity for such drastic legislation.

Mr. President, I have talked longer against this motion than I expected when I took the floor. I believe, however, that its importance fully justifies the length of the discussion. It is a vastly important question, Mr. President, a bill which should not be treated in an extraordinary way in the absence of extraordinary conditions or extraordinary reasons.

The Senator from Virginia, of course, does not mean it, for he is incapable of doing such a thing intentionally, but nevertheless this motion I regard as a practical affront to the Committee on Public Lands. It is aimed directly at their jurisdiction and because of an assumed friendliness in some other committee it is to be taken from them and placed in alien hands; that is to say, in the hands of an alien committee. I do not know what vote the Senate will take upon it, but I believe that if the motion of the Senator from Virginia prevails we will create a precedent that will return again and again to plague us.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, yesterday the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] used this language in the debate on his motion. I quote from the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings:

> The navy yard at Puget Sound was once public land subject to entry, and was set aside.

I am informed on the best of authority that the land embraced in the Puget Sound Navy Yard was not public land when that navy yard was established, and never was, except at a remote time, and that it was entered by entrymen, and became in that manner private land—privately owned land—long before that navy yard was established. It was not public land at the time the Puget Sound Navy Yard was instituted. The land for that navy yard was acquired by purchase or condemnation. Some of it had to be condemned. I am informed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that those are the facts. So I beg to correct the unintentional mistake that the distinguished Senator from Virginia made.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is entirely mistaken about any mistake on my part. Of course it was once public land. The whole of the land in the Northwestern Territory belonged to the United States Government. It was afterwards segregated from the public land and ceased to be subject to public entry, but after it ceased to be subject to public entry it was no longer public land subject to the jurisdiction of the Public Lands Committee. My contention was that if the Senator's position is correct about this, if it had ever been public land what is no longer public land is subject to the Public Lands Committee, that if it has ever been public land the Public Lands Committee ought to take jurisdiction for all future time of anything affecting it.

Mr. MYERS. The mistake of the Senator from Virginia consisted in using this language, "and was set aside." Here is the language:

> The navy yard at Puget Sound was once public land subject to entry, and was set aside.

It never was set aside, I am informed. It passed into private ownership through entry under the land laws of the United States, and at the time the Puget Sound Navy Yard was established the land was privately owned, and it was acquired by the Government of the United States through purchase and condemnation.

Mr. SWANSON. Consequently the Senator thinks that the Naval Committee ought to have jurisdiction of land that was once public land, against private ownership, if it wants it for naval purposes. The Naval Committee ought to have jurisdiction, ought it not?

Mr. MYERS. In the case of a navy yard that has been once established by law and is being devoted to the exclusive purposes of the Navy, I think the Naval Committee ought to have charge.

Mr. SWANSON. That is precisely the case here. This was private land. The claimant entered upon this public domain and got possession of it as private land, and we ask to continue that private land in the naval reserve precisely as was done at Puget Sound.

Mr. MYERS. These possessory interests are not patented. There is no patented land.

Mr. SWANSON. They claim that they ought to be patented. They have no title——

Mr. MYERS. No; they have not.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, they have no title unless it passes from the Government to themselves. This is private land that we are trying to take. We do not want to condemn public land, and the Senator has admitted that in the case of the Puget Sound Navy Yard, where it got into the possession of private individuals and the Navy wanted it, it ought to go to the Naval Committee. That is this case.

Mr. MYERS. Is any of the land in the oil reserve in California patented land?

Mr. SWANSON. There have been patents issued to some, and some of it is not patented. Some patents have been issued to the Southern Pacific Railroad, and other people have gotten patents.

Mr. MYERS. I do not understand that the Senator's bill intends to take away lands that are patented to the Southern Pacific Railroad.

Mr. SWANSON. We do; we condemn it. We take land for a navy yard or for any purpose. It seems to me the Senator admits that the Naval Committee has jurisdiction of this matter if he takes that position.

Mr. MYERS. No; I do not. I will ask the Senator whether most of the land in this reserve is patented land or unpatented land.

Mr. SWANSON. About 9,000 acres, I understand, are in contest as to whether a patent ought or ought not to issue.

Mr. MYERS. How much of it is patented land which is admitted beyond dispute to be properly patented and properly owned by the patentee?

Mr. SWANSON. I could not state the exact amount.

Mr. MYERS. There is none at all that I know of.

Mr. SWANSON. There are, I understand, thousands and thousands of acres of private land that the Public Lands Committee has nothing whatever to do with, that are not public lands, that are not governmental lands, and it is the desire to have them condemned for naval purposes. What jurisdiction have you of private lands to determine whether the Navy should have them I have never been able to understand.

Mr. THOMAS. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. There are in the naval reserve in California lands which are in private ownership under patent. There are also locations which are claimed to have been made by a strict observance of all of the legal requirements which are not patented, and which are, therefore, subject to entry. There are a few locations unpatented in the Wyoming reserve, but there is no patented land in that reserve.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Virginia wanted to know what right the Public Lands Committee of the Senate had to deal with private lands as provided for in the bill. Section 4 authorizes the President to agree with any claimant or owner of any property taken under this act upon a division of land or the proceeds of operation upon any exchange of land without the naval petroleum reserve for lands within the reserve. In other words, the section provides that the actual owners as well as the actual claimants of lands within this reserve may select lands from the public lands.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, in the first speech making this motion, I said there is but one thing in this bill which even by a remote construction the Public Lands Committee could get jurisdiction, and it was the provision which permitted an exchange of land inside the naval reserve where the President could satisfy claimants outside of the naval reserve upon lands which were public. In that phase of it I think that the Public Lands Committee and the Naval Committee would have equal jurisdiction. The exchange of lands inside the naval reserve the Naval Committee, I think, has jurisdiction of, but lands outside of the naval reserve the Committee on Public Lands has jurisdiction of. The committee could then probably take jurisdiction if that was all there was in the bill. But ninety-nine one-hundredths of the bill affects entirely the naval reserve. If the Senator takes that part which gives jurisdiction to the Committee on Public Lands I am willing to amend the bill and leave that out, so that you can consider the phase in connection with the exchange. I will offer an amendment to eliminate from the bill the provision that applies to an exchange of public lands. I am very anxious that you shall not have the least excuse for jurisdiction.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator say he will offer it?

Mr. SWANSON. I say I will be very glad to eliminate it, so as not to give any idea that in the slightest way your jurisdiction was infringed upon.

Mr. THOMAS. Then the Senator consents to eliminate everything except the enacting clause?

Mr. SWANSON. No; because that is about what the Senator wants us to do.

Mr. THOMAS. Exactly.

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly that is what he wants done. They have been trying for years to keep the Navy from having this land for the proper use of the American Navy. I do not mean that the Senator is trying to do it; but there was a fight before he came here, and the question has been fought over ever since 1910, when the lands were withdrawn, whether they should be saved for the Navy or used for other purposes. I can understand well that the Senator and those that take his view of the case would be delighted to have all eliminated except the enacting clause.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that is true. It is true, because I think I know better than the Senator from Virginia that the Navy does not need this reserve, or any of it.

Mr. SWANSON. So far as that is concerned, the Navy to-day——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana further yield?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator from Montana yielded to me.

Mr. SWANSON. No; he yielded to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator from Montana yielded to me, and the Senator from Virginia interrupted before I concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom did the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. MYERS. I do not remember, Mr. President; it was so long ago.

Mr. SWANSON. As the Senator from Utah is so impatient that he can not wait for others, I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. MYERS. I yield now to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply wanted to conclude the statement I had started to make when the Senator from Virginia interrupted without asking permission through the Chair.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the Senator from Montana yielded to me first and he and I were discussing the Puget Sound Navy Yard when the Senator from Utah injected himself into the debate.

Mr. SMOOT. I addressed the Chair, and I assumed that the Senator from Montana had yielded to me.

Mr. MYERS. I am yielding to the Senator from Utah, and when he finishes his remarks I would like to have the floor a little while myself.

Mr. SMOOT. All I was going to add to what I said before was this, that if the position taken by the Senator from Virginia is correct, then the Public Lands Committee had no jurisdiction whatever over the Walsh bill unless lands affected were eliminated from a reserve. That bill was sent to the Public Lands Committee. The Senate acted upon it, the report was made, and not a word was said about the lands that were in reserves that were legislated upon under that bill. That is what I wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator will take that as a precedent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. When the Naval Committee made objection to disposing of the naval provision in that bill, it was gladly eliminated, showing that they thought the Navy ought to be considered in the disposition of the naval reserve. Now, if the Senator will take that bill as a precedent, the precedent is still stronger for the Naval Committee having jurisdiction of this measure, because that was eliminated from the bill, expecting this bill to follow.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that there was no objection to the elimination from the Walsh bill, and the question as to where it should be referred never was questioned when referred to the Public Lands Committee.

Another thing I want to call the Senator's attention to is that the Public Lands Committee have reported time and again legislation affecting these very reserves. I want to say also, and I say it without a question of doubt in my mind, that the legislation would have been passed if the Navy Department and the Interior Department had not been at loggerheads over the question of the character of the legislation. The Public Lands Committee have always been friendly to legislation of this character. The statement which was made by the Senator from Virginia that the Public Lands Committee—and he did not say any particular member of it, but the committee—wanted to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill does not apply to the majority of that committee. I am quite certain, as I said yesterday, if the bill was referred to the Public Lands Committee the committee would report the bill favorably to the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, last year—I can not say whether by resolution or how it was done—the Naval Committee was requested for two weeks to make a full investigation of this matter, looking into the right and title of claimants in this naval reserve, and if I mistake not that committee was invoked by western Senators, members of the Committee on Public Lands, to see what action should be taken. Did they say we had no jurisdiction? Why did they ask us to investigate it if we had no jurisdiction?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it will be found that the resolution was introduced by a member of the Naval Committee and referred to that committee. It was never discussed in the Senate, and it referred only to titles of lands within the reserve. The question of the disposition of the land never was referred to the committee. If that had been in the resolution I have no doubt but what there would have been a question raised on the floor of the Senate as to its reference.

Mr. SWANSON. I think it referred to a bill introduced by a member of the Public Lands Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. If I remember it aright it was introduced by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. I am only stating now from my memory, but as I remember it it was introduced by the Senator from Nevada, and he, as a member of the Naval Committee, asked that it be referred to that committee, and nobody objected because it had no reference to the disposition of the lands. But this bill is for the disposition of the land, and whenever it comes to the disposition of public lands the measure ought to go to the Public Lands Committee or that committee ought to be discharged from the further consideration of public-land questions.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is entirely mistaken. These lands have been set aside for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy by proclamation. This is a bill to allow the Navy to do what is its right as to refining oil, as to storing it, and as to what disposition shall be made of it, as the Navy sees proper. Does the Senator think the Committee on Public Lands knows better than the Naval Committee the amount of oil needed by the Navy, the amount for refining and for stores, and for everything that appertains to the Navy? These lands were set aside for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy in 1912, and all we ask is that the Naval Committee may investigate and report as to the operation, as to the refining, and as to the storing and the disposition to make of it. As I stated, the only thing in which it affects the public lands outside of that is the privilege given the President to exchange lands of claimants in the Naval Reserve for lands outside, and I will ask that that be excluded, so that you can not have the slightest idea of any intrusion on your rights.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Utah, and then I shall decline to yield further.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that these lands were withdrawn by a proclamation of the President for a naval reserve based upon what is known as the Pickett Act, and that authorized the President of the United States to only withdraw lands temporarily.

Mr. SWANSON. What did temporarily mean?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I decline to yield further. I demand the floor for myself.

Mr. SWANSON. If it means that the President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is entitled to the floor and refuses to yield.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask not to be interrupted during the remainder of my brief remarks. I am always glad to give a liberal latitude to other Senators for interjecting their speeches into the body of my speech, in order that their speeches may be read by the public, but I do not care to go too far in that direction, and I decline to yield further. I started out to show that the Senator from Virginia was mistaken, and I ask not to be interrupted until I have completed my exposé of his mistake. The Senator on yesterday said:

> The navy yard at Puget Sound was once public land subject to entry and was set aside.

There never was an acre of the Puget Sound Navy Yard set aside. At the time the Puget Sound Navy Yard was established there was not an acre of unpatented land embraced within its boundaries; every acre was patented land, and every acre was acquired by the United States Government by purchase or condemnation. That is my information from the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who is acquainted with the facts.

As to this reserve in the State of Wyoming, embracing the land affected by the Senator's bill, there is not an acre of patented land. In California there is some land patented to the Southern Pacific Railroad, but the greater part by far of the land affected in the State of California is unpatented land. So there is no analogy whatever in the two cases, and the Senator from Virginia was clearly mistaken.

Now, this withdrawal of which so much has been said is based on the Pickett Act, and I will read the Pickett Act.

> Be it enacted, etc., That the President may, at any time in his discretion, temporarily withdraw from settlement, location, sale, or entry any of the public lands of the United States, including the District of Alaska, and reserve the same for water-power sites, irrigation, classification of lands, or other public purposes to be specified in the orders of withdrawals, and such withdrawals or reservations shall remain in force until revoked by him or by an act of Congress.

That is the first section of the act. It provides for the temporary withdrawal—only temporary—from settlement, location, sale, or entry of any of the public lands of the United States, and for reserving the same for water-power sites, irrigation, classification of lands, or other public purposes. Does that withdrawal make them cease to be public lands of the United States? There have been thousands and thousands of acres withdrawn from the public domain by executive order for water-power sites. Would any Senator claim that those lands withdrawn for water-power sites cease to be public lands of the United States; that the title is no longer in the United States; that the disposition and the use of the land is no longer under the control of the United States? Thousands of acres were withdrawn for forest reserves and other purposes, but they are still public lands of the United States. If the contention of the Senator from Virginia is correct——

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. SWANSON. Did the Committee on Commerce take possession of the water-power bills?

Mr. MYERS. On navigable streams, but scarcely one of them runs through the public domain. The Senate Committee on Public Lands has taken charge of all bills that proposed legislation pertaining to the development of water power on the public lands of the United States. If the contention of the Senator from Virginia is correct, then that legislation, I suppose, would have gone to the Senate Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the Senator is mistaken about the fact. As I understand it, where all navigable rivers were concerned the bills went to the Committee on Commerce that had jurisdiction of the subject. If the same analysis applies on lands belonging to the Navy, a measure affecting the Navy ought to go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MYERS. There are no navigable streams of any consequence running through public lands. If there be any at all, the proportion is negligible; it is inconsequential. Then, I suppose the Senator would have legisation for the development of water power on nonnavigable streams go to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and leave the Committee on Public Lands without any jurisdiction over legislation for the development of water power on public lands. All the legislation for the development of water power on the public domain of the country has gone to the Senate Committee on Public Lands.

Furthermore, section 2 of the Pickett Act says——

Mr. POINDEXTER. May I ask the Senator just a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask it to indicate a reason why such bills as he has referred to have been sent to the Public Lands Committee. Is it not a fact that there has been no committee on water power? If there had been a committee on water power, water-power bills would naturally have gone to that committee.

Mr. MYERS. That might be; and if we had other committees not now in existence a great many other bills might go to other committees than the committees to which they go; but bills for development of water power on public lands have all gone to the Committee on Public Lands, because it was clearly the proper committee under the rules of the Senate and according to the committees as they are now organized and exist.

Section 2 of the Pickett Act provides:

> That all lands withdrawn under the provisions of this act shall at all times be open to exploration, discovery, occupation, and purchase under the mining laws of the United States, so far as the same apply to minerals other than coal, oil, gas, and phosphates——

Showing that the Congress in enacting that law had in mind the plain and specific intent to retain within the Government of the United States the control of those lands and the granting of any privileges or rights or concessions in them; retained in the Federal Government the right to say what might and what might not be done with them and the right to preserve the interests of the public in them as a part of the public domain of the country.

SUSPENSION OF ORDER OF FUEL ADMINISTRATOR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, under the order of the Senate the consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], relative to the suspension for five days of the order of the Fuel Administrator, will now be resumed.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me simply to have a dispatch read?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit, and ask to have read, a telegram, which I have just received, touching the question under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

> HON. J. H. GALLINGER,
> United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:
>
> Our mills in your State have substantial Government orders. Garfield drastic order seriously affects the ability of the company to make deliveries of cloth to the Army. We strenuously oppose the order and appeal to you to remedy this national catastrophe.
> WM. M. WOOD,
> President American Woolen Co.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Norris	Smoot
Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Sterling
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Stone
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Poindexter	Sutherland
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Swanson
Calder	Kellogg	Ransdell	Thomas
Culberson	Kirby	Reed	Tillman
Cummins	Knox	Robinson	Townsend
Curtis	La Follette	Shafroth	Trammell
Fernald	Lewis	Sheppard	Underwood
Gallinger	McCumber	Sherman	Vardaman
Gerry	McKellar	Shields	Watson
Gore	McLean	Simmons	Weeks
Gronna	McNary	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott
Hale	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Harding	Myers	Smith, Md.
Hardwick	New	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators having responded to their names, there is a quorum present. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, pursuant to the announcement made to the Senate a short while ago, the subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures procured the attendance of Dr. Garfield for the purpose of learning his reasons for the issuance of the order, now under consideration, touching the closing of factories. It is due to Dr. Garfield that I advise the Senate that he came immediately upon request and in the most courteous manner answered the inquiries of the committee. I shall endeavor, and I hope without interruption, to present a fair epitome of the statement made by Dr. Garfield. I shall not object to interruption as soon as I have presented that digest of his statement. The testimony of Dr. Garfield is being transcribed, but only a small portion has been delivered, and so I am obliged to speak from memory. If in any respect I vary from an accurate statement, my associates upon the committee will correct me. I apologize to the Senate for making an oral report, but time presses, and there has been no opportunity to prepare a written report.

In substance, Dr. Garfield stated that the order as it appeared in the newspapers was substantially correct, but he produced a typewritten document, which he furnished to the Senate as the exact order so far as it has been perfected. The doctor stated that the order which had been given to the newspapers was in the nature of a brief of a more detailed order that is being prepared, but that it contained the substance of the completed order, with the exception that there should be added to the order the further statement that the various classes of consumers who are to be entitled to preference and who are indicated by what we call the initialed paragraphs of the order are all to stand upon the same level; that is, there are to be no priorities among those named in the initialed classes, to wit:

(a) Of railroads.

(b) Of domestic consumers, hospitals, charitable institutions, and Army and Navy cantonments.

(c) Of public utilities, telephone and telegraph plants.

(d) Of ships and vessels for bunker purposes.

(e) Of the United States for strictly governmental purposes, not including orders from or for factories or plants working on contracts for the United States.

(f) Of municipal, county, or State governments for necessary public uses.

(g) Of manufacturers of perishable food or of food for necessary immediate consumption.

The doctor stated that all of those classes stand upon the same level; that there are to be no priorities among them. He further stated that there were to be certain exceptions of industries from the order; that the only one absolutely determined on as yet was that shipbuilding was not to be taken as within the order requiring a shutting down.

Mr. ROBINSON. And airplane construction.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator from Arkansas—and airplane construction; but that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are each preparing an additional list of excepted industries. He further suggested that in a public hearing he had rather not be more specific, but indicated that the industries which were to be excepted were those which, in the opinion of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, were immediately connected with the production of war supplies. Otherwise the order is to stand as presented.

Mr. VARDAMAN. He also stated that he reserved the right to enlarge the list.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; he stated that the right was reserved to enlarge the list. I thank the Senator from Mississippi for the correction.

Dr. Garfield further stated that the order to close down would apply to factories possessing coal as well as to factories which do not possess coal, and that it was the policy of the administration to procure the closing down also of those industries which were operated by water power. He stated that he did not have authority under the terms of the law to compel that, but I think I can say that he said, or practically said, that it was the purpose to procure the closing down of all water-power factories; that that is the policy which is to be pursued.

The reason assigned was that if factory A happened to have a supply of coal on hand sufficient to operate for some time and factory B was dependent upon a supply of coal that was in transit and factory B was prevented from getting its coal by reason of this governmental order, it would be unjust to factory B to allow factory A to continue to operate; and that the same principle, namely, that it is unjust to allow one factory to operate that has the ability to operate while the Government takes an action with reference to coal supplies that stops other factories from operating, ought to apply to factories operated by water power as well as to those operated by steam obtained from coal.

The reasons assigned for the order were: (a)—I am stating them by paragraphs, not meaning that he stated them in the exact numerical order, but simply for the purpose of clarity.

(a) To prevent an increase of congestion at the ports or on the railroads leading to the ports of the country.

(b) To decrease congestion on other railroads in other parts of the country.

(c) To prevent inequalities between those factories which have coal and those factories which have no coal. I have already covered that.

(d) To recover from the coal shortage; that is, to permit——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator to restate the reason for closing so as to equalize opportunities in business?

Mr. REED. Well, that is my language, not the doctor's; I am trying to express his idea. It was:

(c) To prevent inequalities between those factories which have coal and those factories which have no coal.

(d) To recover from the coal shortage; that is, to permit coal production to go on and to restrict to a large extent coal consumption by stopping the factories. This is to be accomplished by continuing the work of the mines and by diverting the coal procured from the mines and the coal in transit to the preferential consumers in the order which I have already read to the Senate.

4. It is not proposed to take the coal from the factories now possessing coal and to use that coal to supply domestic wants. Neither is it proposed to take the coal from factories not in the preferential list and use it to keep the factories in the preferential classes running, but to allow the coal that is in the closed factories to remain unused; that is to say, the factories are to be stopped and the coal kept on hand.

5. Dr. Garfield bases his authority for this action upon section 1 and section 25 of the so-called Lever bill, which is now a law.

On inquiry, the doctor said he could not tell us how many factories at present were supplied with coal or how much coal was on hand in these factories; the information was lacking.

That, I think, is a fair statement of the testimony, without the argument, which it is impossible for me to reproduce from memory.

I will say now that, if any of my associates on the committee think there is any part of this statement that ought to be corrected or changed, I shall be glad to have their suggestions at this time; I am trying to make the recital as fair as I can.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. Certainly; I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall not attempt to say that the Senator has not made a correct statement, and doubtless as full a statement as he contemplated making. I believe that there are some observations made by Dr. Garfield during the investigation which will be of value to the Senate; but, so far as the statement made by the Senator from Missouri is concerned, I think no reasonable objection can be made to it. There were, however, questions discussed to which the Senator has not adverted, which, doubtless, in the Senator's mind are not material, and I do not think it would serve any useful purpose for me to refer to them now; but, with the consent of the Senate, a little later I believe I shall ask the privilege of referring to some arguments presented by Dr. Garfield, which have not been referred to by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I have stated that there was some argument, back and forth, that I did not undertake to reproduce.

I may be permitted now, speaking for myself, to try and bring together the substantive statements of Dr. Garfield, and I want to do it——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, before he begins another phase of the discussion, I think it but just to Dr. Garfield to say that, in response to a question propounded by me, he said that the purpose of this order was—first, to provide coal to prevent the poor men, women, and children of this country from freezing; and, second, to supply with coal our ships which are needed to carry freight to our allies across the water, but which are now lying in port and kept there because of a lack of coal. Those were the two cardinal purposes to be subserved.

Now, as to the argument, of course we indulged in a good deal of suggestion one way and another, but I think the Senator from Missouri has made a very candid and a rather full statement of the substance of what Dr. Garfield said.

Mr. REED. I endeavored to cover the points made by the Senator from Mississippi; he has, however, covered the subject better than I did. The purpose, Dr. Garfield says, is to clear the congestion at the great docks of the country. In substance, he was asked whether that could not be accomplished by merely stopping the shipment of goods to the great docks of the country without stopping the plants manufacturing the goods. I hesitate to try to give his answer to that. Perhaps one of my associates on the committee can do it better than I can; I confess that I did not get a reason that seemed to me to be a convincing one.

We inquired why the factories which had coal could not be permitted to run, and how stopping a factory not in the preferred list from using coal now in its bins increased the coal of those in the preferred list? The doctor, however, insisted that, as I have stated, if factory A had coal and factory B did not have coal and the Government by this order stopped the coal going to factory B, it was unjust to factory B to let factory A run; that all factories ought to shut down because some would be out of coal.

Inquiry was then made whether that was not making the general welfare of the country and the welfare of millions of wage earners subordinate to the financial or trade race between the owners of mills, some of whom happen to have coal while others have not. Dr. Garfield insisted—I think I can say he stoutly insisted—that that inequality ought not to be permitted. So far as I am concerned, and speaking for myself, I think the position most unsound.

There were, according to the census of 1914, 275,791 factories in the United States that were reported. I presume it is safe to say that that number is now considerably over 300,000.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, had the Senator concluded his statement of all the reasons that were given by the Fuel Administrator?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. I did not know the Senator had concluded.

Mr. REED. Yes; I had concluded that.

The total number of employees in factories in 1914 was 8,265,426. I think it perfectly safe to say that the number to-day is not less than 11,000,000. I base that statement upon other figures obtained at other times and from other investigations. If that is so, the total number of people dependent upon these factories, estimating 5 to an employee, is 55,000,000. If the number of factories to be affected by this order is one-half of the total factories—and I am confident the proportion is much greater—then there will be directly affected by this order as to their livelihood or income approximately 30,000,000 people. I am referring now to the wage earners in the factories. If the wage earners who are directly affected are 5,000,000 in number, and if they earn $3 a day each, and if they are put out of work for 15 days, that is a loss of work equal to one day for 75,000,000 people, which, at $3 a day, will make a loss in wages alone of $225,000,000. The value of the product compared with wages in 1914 was approximately 6 to 1; and if we apply that ratio, we have a loss in the value of the product of these factories which would amount to $1,350,000,000.

But this applies only to the wages of the men in the factories for the total period of time—15 days. There is consumed in the manufacture an enormous amount of raw materials. Out of the $24,000,000,000 of manufactured product in 1914 the raw materials were worth $14,000,000,000. The very large number of men employed in producing those raw materials I am unable at this time to estimate; but the wage loss alone by virtue of the stoppage of the industries of this country under this order, according to the best estimate I am able to make on short notice, will be not less than one and a half to one and three-quarter billion dollars.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of that enormous loss to the wage earners of the country, what condition are these people to be in to purchase coal to keep them warm, admitting that there is coal to be bought?

Mr. REED. There are some questions that the Senator can ask me that I am unable to answer, and that is one of them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. In answer to that question, the Fuel Administrator said that as this measume was a war measure and was in the interest of the United States and all of its people, he indulged the hope that the losses would not all fall upon the laboring men who were put out of employment for the five days, and that the factories would bear a part of this loss or give them wages during the time of their enforced idleness.

Mr. REED. Yes; he said more than that—that he thought it was the duty of the factory owner to keep up the wages as part of his sacrifice. I called his attention to the fact that even if the factory owner paid the wages of the men, thus preserving them from direct loss, still the production of the country would be decreased and the economic loss to the country would be equal to the total value of the goods that would have been produced, less the cost of production. Attention was also called to the fact that those products were essential to the economic welfare of this country, and that upon our economic condition depended our ability to carry on the war; that it is a war, as we sometimes have been told of coal, sometimes of steel, sometimes of ships, and more frequently of money; but, as a matter of fact, it is a war of resources; that when we shall have stopped millions of men from working and hundreds of thousands of factories from running we will have inevitably reduced the aggregate of our national resources. Attention was called to the thought the products of these factories are probably worth hundreds of times the value of the coal that may be saved.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to his colleague?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from New Hampshire asked how this order would help the working people, if their wages were cut off, in securing coal to warm their homes, if there was any coal to be had. It is the last point in the Senator's interrogatory that struck me as a point that ought to be thought of at this juncture—if there is any coal to be had.

As I understand, the purpose here is to provide coal. One trouble, as we are told daily, is that there is not a sufficient amount of coal to be had. Now, shutting off wages is one very serious interference with procuring coal, undoubtedly; but, on the other hand, if the supply of coal that may be utilized is vastly increased, I think the one at least should be set off against the other.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is wisdom in what both of the Senators have said, but here seems to me to be the difficulty: It is not proposed by this order to produce a single pound more coal than is now being produced. It is not proposed to take the coal now on hand in the factories not in the preferential list and use them to run the factories in the preferred list. Neither is it proposed to turn these coals over to heat the homes of the people. It is only proposed to let these coals lie idle and deprive hundreds of thousands of people of work.

I stated in substance to Dr. Garfield that the order could be so limited as to give every preference in the distribution of coal desired, so that the coals would go to the exact places where the fuel administrator proposes to send them, thus giving to the householder all the coal that he will get under this order, giving to the munition factory all the coal it will get under this order, and giving to the railroad all the coal it will get under this order, and yet no single factory burning coal be required to shut down. That such a modification would save the closing of the hundreds of thousands of factories that have coal, and I asked him why these factories should be compelled to shut down. I especially asked why we should shut down the water mills? Why should the whole business of the country be halted, and all the wage earners be turned out of employment, because some factories may be out of coal?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just a moment. I make for the present no quarrel with the proposition of giving preferences in the distribution of coal, but I can not see why the factory that has coal should not continue to operate, in view of the fact that it is not proposed to take that coal and distribute it to other factories or among freezing people. Above all I can not see why, for the purpose of preserving theoretical equality in the race for profits between manufacturing plants, we should stop the water mill because the coal is exhausted in some particular coal-consuming plant.

The Senator from Nebraska has risen. I yield. I was about through.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to ask the Senator whether Dr. Garfield gave any information, or, if he did not, whether the Senator has any information that he can give to the Senate, as to what proportion of the mills and factories affected have coal now, so that they could run?

Mr. REED. The Senator was not here when I made the statement that Dr. Garfield had stated to us that he did not have that information, either as to the number of factories or as to the amount of coal on hand.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. What reason, if any, was given for having this order go into effect on only 24 hours' notice?

Mr. REED. We did not ask the question.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, Dr. Garfield stated that this matter had been under consideration for several days or weeks; that the matter had been carefully worked out by himself in conjunction with other departments, and I presume he thought it was right and proper.

Mr. REED. I can throw a little light on that, Mr. President, because Dr. Garfield said that the reason the excepted factories were not specified in the order, and the reason he did not want to give them out now, was that the Fuel Administrator would be besieged by others seeking to be excepted. I think the fair inference is that they gave out the order on short notice because they wanted to get it into execution very promptly.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if Dr. Garfield was interrogated as to the power which he possessed under the provisions of the Lever law, to which he referred, to shut down the operation of factories running by water power?

Mr. REED. In answer to the Senator I would say that he was asked, and he stated that he thought the power was contained in sections 1 and 25 of the Lever bill; but we did not go into any legal argument.

We knew that the Senate was practically waiting, and therefore we simply took his statement as to where he found his power, without further argument.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, he misunderstood the Senator from Colorado. Dr. Garfield was asked about the power to interfere with the operation of a water mill, or a mill operated by water power, and he said he had no authority under that act, but that he was going to appeal to them upon grounds of patriotism.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator from Colorado limit his question to water mills?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I did not so understand, and am obliged for the correction.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I have not read the law for some time; but if my recollection serves me correctly, I do not think there is a word or a phrase in it to justify an order like this in its application to mills run by water power, because such an order can conserve nothing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether any statement was made by the Fuel Administrator as to whether plants using natural gas were included in these regulations, and also plants using hydroelectric power?

Mr. REED. The questions were not asked him, but I take it that if it is intended as a matter of policy to, in effect, apply this order to water mills, it probably would include natural gas, hydroelectric power, and everything else.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri specifically whether or not Dr. Garfield indicated the language in section 1 and the language in section 25 upon which he relied for authority to issue a notice to prevent manufacturers from burning coal that is already within their bins?

Mr. REED. I ought to say, in fairness to Dr. Garfield, that we were approaching the end of our inquiries. We found it necessary to come to the Senate. I therefore asked him to indicate the sections on which he relied. He said that he thought the power was lodged in section 25 and also in section 1, a part of which he read. I think I said to him in substance: "We have not time, Doctor, to go into the legal argument. I want to know the clauses of the bill on which you rely"; and he stood upon that statement.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, we find the authority upon which Dr. Garfield relies in the last three lines of section 1:

> The President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act.

It is a general power.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I only wish now to indicate that so far as I am concerned I have examined this act with a very great deal of care since this resolution was introduced this morning. I find nothing, especially nothing in the lines that have just been read, that indicates that this act ever contemplated that an individual was to be prevented from using his own property for his own purposes. As to section 25, I have read and reread that, and I find that the regulations which the President is authorized to make there and which apply to distributors and salesmen of coal, extend only to the production and the sale and the shipment and the distribution and the apportionment and the storage thereof.

I should like to ask just one further question, and that is, Did the doctor indicate that he had consulted the Attorney General or anyone else in connection with the making of this order?

Mr. REED. We did not ask that question. The Senator will understand that we were hurrying. We did not ask him whom he had consulted. I think I might say that we did not think it best, perhaps, to go outside of an inquiry with reference to what the Fuel Administrator had done in his own name.

Mr. KNOX. For myself, I rather think that a million German soldiers turned loose in this country would not create the havoc that this order will create if enforced.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question before he yields the floor?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to know whether it is the Senator's opinion that Mr. Garfield could not be induced to modify that portion of the order which prevents competing industries, we will say, from carrying on their business where they have the coal or the water power to carry on their business?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the only answer I can make to that is that the principal part of the examination centered around that question. I think the most of the time was consumed in a sort of an argument between the members of the committee and Dr. Garfield upon that question. I think I can say, in all fairness to him, and I think he would desire me to say, that he very stoutly maintained that all ought to close if one was required to close.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if an analogy to that proposition would not be found if the Food Administrator to-night should issue an order that nobody living east of the Mississippi River should eat anything for the next week? Would not that be about the same method of curing the evil?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in all matters concerning the Food Administration, I beg to be excused from even the appearance of criticism by indulging in what might be regarded as the odium of comparison. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is it the opinion of the Senator from Missouri that if we pass this resolution it will do any good?

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator from Georgia will pardon me for not answering that question. Let me conclude and yield the floor to others.

I was speaking of the extent of an order of this kind. The capital invested in manufacturing industries in 1914 was nearly $23,000,000,000. I think it is safe to say that that has been enormously increased since then. The yearly value of the products was then over $24,000,000,000. I think it safe to say that figure can be now multiplied by three or four. The value of the raw materials then consumed in manufacturing was over $14,000,000,000. That, I think, has been correspondingly increased. These figures have relation to the matter under discussion only in the sense that the greater the industry and the greater the values, the greater is the disturbance resulting from stopping them for any period of time, however short.

I have this one thing that I want to make plain to the Senate as my personal view. I am speaking and have been speaking, of course, merely for myself and not for other members of the committee. If it were proposed to stop delivering coal to factories generally in order that certain preferential factories might be served, that might be or might not be wise, but let us assume it to be wise; and if it were proposed to stop the delivery of coal to any factory until the people had enough coal to keep them from suffering, that might be wise, and I think if the necessity existed it would be very proper. But it is now proposed to take all the coal that is being produced, all of the coal that is in transit, and devote it to these specially favored industries. For the moment I am assuming them to be the right industries. Thus far I make no quarrel with this order. Let that part of the order go without criticism from me, at this time at least.

But I can find no justification in stopping all the industries of the country in order to catch up with coal production when you are not going to produce a single pound more coal, and when it is not proposed to devote the coal that is on hand to any of the needs or wants that we have spoken of as imperative. I can see no justification for not allowing the factories to go on and use the coal they have on hand and keep their people employed. Some of them happily may run on and never have to stop a day, for the coal supply may be abundant before their stocks are exhausted. All factories ought to be permitted to run and produce; and certainly water mills ought to be allowed to run.

I say that in my judgment—and I am trying to speak with great moderation, as you can observe—there is no justification in turning millions of people out of employment, and in stopping the creation of those things that are necessary not only to the progress of the war but to the happiness of the country simply because some individual manufacturers may under this order find themselves without coal, and hence their competitors may gain a little advantage. That is sacrificing all of the people of the country for the benefit of a few manufacturers. That is sacrificing the interests of millions of laborers in order to preserve the equality in the financial race between factories with coal and factories without coal. I can not find justification for that kind of a proceeding.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. I yield. I am yielding the floor, but I will answer the question.

Mr. BORAH. I do not care to discuss it, but I should like to ask the question, has the Senator any doubt as a lawyer outside of the question of power plants and power mills, that the matter has passed out of our hands and beyond our control, assuming that the Lever law is constitutional?

Mr. REED. I do not find in this bill in a hasty reading any authority to stop a factory running that is employing its own coal. I only read the opening section to which attention was called. It provides—

> That by reason of the existence of a state of war it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, fuel, including fuel oil and natural gas, and fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients—

And so forth.

Then follows these lines:

> The President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act.

The Senator, I think, will agree that the last clause, that "the President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act," means no more than that where Congress has granted a specific power or made a specific provision the President can carry that provision out. It does not give him a general roving commission to make such rules and orders and regulations touching the whole subject matter as he may desire.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just let me finish the statement. Therefore, we must find within the act itself the authority to close the factories, and when we have found that authority, if we can find it, the President has authority to issue the necessary orders to carry out that power. Now, when we come to section 25, which is the section Dr. Garfield referred to, it seems to me that it is limited solely to the question of the production and distribution of coal. After the coal——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. In just a moment. After the coal has reached the factory, it is the personal property of the proprietor of the factory. True, the Government probably possesses the power to commandeer and take the coal for the public use in the prosecution of the war. But this order does not propose to take the coal. It undertakes to say to the proprietor of the factory in which there may be lodged some coal, "You shall not run your factory." I confess, although my reading has been somewhat hasty of the act, I do not find that authority in it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I believe the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] wanted the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I thought the Senator from Idaho had completed his statement.

Mr. REED. I did not permit him.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the language. If the Senator will refer back to the debate, he will recall the fact that it was the intention at the time, expressed many times on the floor, to lodge this matter completely and absolutely within the discretion of the President of the United States. When you examine the language you will find it has been lodged there, if language can lodge it.

Mr. REED. I would be glad to have the Senator call my attention to it.

Mr. BORAH. In the first place, "the President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act."

Mr. REED. What are the provisions of the act?

Mr. BORAH. Let us see and find out:

> That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, whenever and wherever in his judgment necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to fix the price of coal and coke, wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer, to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the method of production, sale, shipment, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among dealers and consumers, domestic or foreign; said authority and power may be exercised by him in each case through the agency of the Federal Trade Commission during the war, or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

Mr. REED. Do you find the words there "to regulate the consumption of coal"?

Mr. BORAH. In the first place, you must read this in connection with the provision in section 1:

> The President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. REED. I know the Senator's view in regard to this legislation; and my own view was that it was very loose legislation. I did not vote for it.

Mr. BORAH. What I contend is——

Mr. REED. But let me call the attention of the Senator, as a lawyer, to the fact that the language that "the President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act" has no vitality except there be found in the law some express provision of a substantial character. When that has been found the President may issue regulations essential to carrying it into effect.

Mr. BORAH. The President is given power to regulate the distribution and apportionment of coal among producers and consumers.

Mr. REED. That is not what they are doing. They are saying to the man who has obtained his coal in the open market and who now has it in his own mill yard, "You can not burn that coal to run your factory."

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but the President has not gone as far as he might have gone, and we can not complain. I imagine under this law the President may go into a factory which has an amount of coal and compel it to distribute that coal among his fellow factory owners or even among his employees.

Mr. REED. That is not what he is attempting to do. The President I do not think has the power to seize the body of coal in the country and take it over and distribute it as he sees fit. But, however that may be, that is not what is being attempted. The man who has the coal is bluntly told, "You shall not put under your boiler and use to turn the spindles of your factory the coal you own and possess in your own right."

Mr. BORAH. It is in the judgment and the discretion of the President as to the proper use and distribution of the coal.

Mr. REED. The word "use" is not in the law in the sense employed by the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. We have lodged the matter by our own volition, after weeks and weeks of debate, absolutely in the judgment and discretion of the Chief Executive. The time for the Congress to have considered this matter that we are now considering was when we passed the law.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. REED. The Senator from Colorado wants to ask me a question. I want to yield the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to ask the Senator a question, and in doing that I wish to direct the attention of the Senator to the first part of section 25, which the Senator from Idaho did not read. I will read it:

> Said authority and power may be exercised by him in each case through the agency of the Federal Trade Commission during the war or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

Now, the question which I wish to ask the Senator is whether in his opinion this tremendous power can be exercised under any provision of the act except through the agency of the Federal Trade Commission, which in the law does not appear at all.

Mr. REED. In normal times, when the law of the land is regarded as worthy of a decent respect and the Constitution is held to be a vital instrument, I would say that a court would be very likely to take the view indicated by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I hope I will be permitted to yield the floor. I do not want to deprive others of it longer.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Missouri will indulge me a moment, it happens to be that upon that particular phase of the bill referred to by the Senator I was conducting the advocacy, and the eminent Senator from Missouri, the junior Senator, for constitutional reasons, as he then saw it, opposed it. I wish to ask both Senators if the power is in the act vesting in the hands of the President complete discretion as to the conduct and control of these industries and he makes the order, what jurisdiction has this body over that order under the law or under any law when the Executive has made the order? Is it not true we are perfectly powerless and the only act we could do that could overturn it would be to repeal the law that vested him with the power?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. REED. I do not care to further discuss the legal questions. At this hour I think it is fruitless. At 5 o'clock tonight factories begin closing and their employees do not know whether they can go to work to-morrow morning or not. I do not care to discuss the question whether we are powerless or not, and I do not care at this time to go further into this matter. I think I have wearied the Senate already. Except I wish to say this, that I hope we have not at least deprived ourself of the right of petition or request, and that, it seems to me, is about as far this resolution goes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will yield to the Senator from Idaho if he desires to ask any question of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BORAH. No; I prefer to hear from the Senator. I understand the Senator is a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that not only the members of this committee but the other Senators as well have not had an opportunity to fully consider the course which the Senate is asked to take at this time. I have not had an extended opportunity of judging the course of procedure of this body, but so far as my information goes the action requested to be taken is unprecedented in the history of our country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The order is also unprecedented.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I agree with the statement injected by the Senator from Nebraska, that not only the action suggested is unprecedented but the thing which suggests the action is also unprecedented and the situation confronting this country is unprecedented. We behold this spectacle: Our country engaged in the greatest war of the ages; so engaged in pursuance of a resolution of this Congress, which pledged the full resources of the country to its prosecution. We have appropriated something like $20,000,000,000, to be used, either directly or indirectly, for the prosecution of the war. We have committed to the Executive of this country not only the expenditure of this vast sum of money but we have committed to him the lives of our sons and brothers. The Chief Executive is endeavoring to prosecute the war. In that prosecution he proposes to issue an order which affects to a very great extent the industries of the country. The order would not be issued unless in the opinion of this Executive, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, it was absolutely vital to the successful conduct of the war. This step has been taken by this Commander in Chief. The proposition now is that the Senate that committed to the hands of its Chief Executive this great power is requesting the Chief Executive not to exercise it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is an erroneous statement. We have asked him to defer it for five days.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I, of course, modify the remark which I made to the extent suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. It is a request to suspend the order, it is true, only for five days, but nevertheless it is a request from this body to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to suspend an action which that Commander in Chief feels is necessary for the prosecution of the war.

I ask you, Senators, if ever in the history of this great country of ours such a request has emanated from this body. If it has I have no recollection or information concerning it. Then if this request is an unprecedented thing, does it not behoove us to give thorough consideration to the effect of what we are called upon to do? Can we in a matter of such grave import stay the hands of the Chief Executive? Shall we say to our enemies that the power and the authority to conduct this war is put into hands which are not competent to conduct it?

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] nods his head as if he considered that was not the issue, but it is the issue in the opinion of those in control of administering this law. The situation is so acute that there is necessity for immediate action, and to defer the order for the five days may, and undoubtedly will, bring suffering and hardship to hundreds of thousands of mothers and children in this country who are suffering for the want of coal.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The author of this resolution had not the slightest intention to reflect upon the ability or upon the wisdom of those who framed this remarkable order. What he sought in the resolution to do was to give five days 'opportunity for common counsel, something that is recognized by this administration as being highly important in great matters of state.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, on the question of five days' delay, I should like to appeal to those who want to think over this question for five days, whether proper consideration is being given to the domestic conditions in this country? Not only are the women and children and families in this country suffering for the want of coal, but the ships of this country are tied up in the harbors for the want of coal; ships which should be under steam to-day carrying across the Atlantic sustenance to our boys who are in the trenches.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The fuel administrator, or the President who stands back of the fuel administrator, has the power, under the law, to commandeer coal, to take it, and to convey it to the ships that are in the harbors waiting for transfer to Europe, and it ought to have been done, I will say very frankly, weeks ago.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I judge from the argument of the Senator from New Mexico that the Senator is of the opinion that this is such an order as the fuel administrator had the authority to make under the direction of the President, under and by virtue of the Lever law?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I intend to reach that point in just a few moments.

Mr. BORAH. I assume that for the reason that the Senator was proceeding upon the theory that this was a valid and legal order. If it is, and the fuel administrator had authority to make it, is there any considerable danger that the mere request upon the part of the Senate will change the program?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I intended to reach that point in the course of the discussion of the things proposed to be done by this order. If, however, the Senator from Idaho will permit a short answer, I might reply in this way: If the order is illegal, does the Senator want to establish the custom of the Senate passing upon the legality of things sought to be done by the executive department of this Government, and whenever, in the opinion of the Senate, the executive department of this Government is exceeding its powers, would the Senator request the executive department to cease from such act?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the Senator perhaps came to a wrong conclusion as to my attitude in regard to this matter. I never want to belong to this body after it has delegated away its lawmaking capacity and has reduced itself to a mere petitioning body. In my humble judgment, we have delegated this power to the President if the Lever law is constitutional at all; and, having delegated it to the President of the United States, I do not myself care to indulge in a mere petitioning of the President not to exercise the power which we have granted him.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I might add, Mr. President, that the Constitution of the United States has put the duty of deciding whether or not the executive department is proceeding in accordance with law upon the courts, or upon another coordinate branch of the Government; and if the Executive is exceeding legal authority, the tribunals of the country, which have been established by our Constitution, ought to be permitted to decide that question in the same way and to the same extent that they have done ever since the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. President, the thing which the Senate is requested to do is to stay the hand of the Chief Executive. The Chief Executive has issued an order, which has been designated as unprecedented. As I have stated, the times are unprecedented; the situation with which we must deal is different from anything which has heretofore existed in the history of the country; but I appeal to you to consider the conditions which the Chief Executive seeks to alleviate by means of this order.

There are several preferred classes who may get coal. It is admitted by the Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the committee, that it is necessary to furnish coal to these preferred classes; he makes no war upon that effort. It is admitted that these things must be done.

Dr. Garfield stated that the situation was acute; and to my mind that furnishes the reason why this order is promulgated, without calling upon all the country to give their views as to whether or not it should be done. The statement stands uncontradicted upon the record that the situation is acute, and the suggestion has been made by a Senator, who was present at the hearing, that that was the reason for promulgating the order at this time.

The situation is acute with reference to what? With reference to furnishing coal for the railroads; with reference to furnishing coal for the families, to the charitable institutions with human inmates; for carrying on the industries which are necessary to be carried on for the conduct of the war; and to furnish bunker coal to the ships. For these purposes the situation is acute. It being acute, I appeal to Senators whether or not the man who shoulders the responsibility for the conduct of the war is not justified in using any means within his power to relieve this most distressing situation. That is recognized. It is said here that no interference should be made with that purpose, and it comes down to this, that because the President has said that those factories which have coal shall not burn the coal while other factories can not get coal, the Senate should request a suspension of this entire order. That is the only thing presented here by the Senator from Missouri to which he seriously objects.

Now, I desire to analyze the question as to whether, in order to stop that act, the Senate should go to the extreme extent of calling upon the Executive to suspend an Executive order. The reason that provision in the order was presented to the committee in this way—and not one reason alone was to be considered as sufficient, but the whole situation was called before us to justify the act—the docks of the country and the railroads of the country are congested with freight, and in order to relieve that congestion it is necessary to stop the supply at the source.

That is only one thing to be considered. In the next place, there is a shortage of coal in this country to the extent of 35,000,000 tons. The evidence, not given to-day by Dr. Garfield, but heretofore given to the Committee on Manufactures, was that the total production of coal in this country had increased 10 per cent, while the demand for coal had increased 20 per cent, and as a result, according to his last statement, there is to-day an absolute shortage of 35,000,000 tons of coal. The administrator has come to the conclusion that, in order to put the households of the country and the industries of the country in running order, and running upon such a basis that there shall be no suffering, industry must be arrested for five days, and then, subsequently, a holiday be observed in each week for a number of weeks. That is the remedy which he proposes. It is agreed that that remedy applied to the factory which now has no coal is justified. The only thing claimed to be unjust is calling upon the factory which has coal to stop running at this time.

If Senators will consider for a moment the question in its broader aspect, it seems to me that this order can not be seriously criticized. If it is necessary to arrest industry in order to catch up with the supply of coal, is it not also necessary that the burden of doing this thing should be placed as equally as possible upon all of the industries of the country—I mean upon those not immediately essential to the carrying on of the war?. If that were done, if they were all shut down at the same time, the burden would be equal.

But it is said some of them have coal and ought to be permitted to continue. The time must come when those who now have coal will not have it, and if you are going to treat them in the same way and make them bear the same burden, no one would suggest that the time would not come when they should be required to shut down for an equal length of time. So, then, the only question presented here is, Shall the factories which have coal shut down now, or shall they be required to shut down, one to-morrow, another next week, and another next month, until the burden has been distributed around?

That is all, Senators, that is involved in this whole discussion—what is the right time to require these factories to be closed? Shall they be required to close all at once or shall they be required to close from day to day as their coal is consumed? That is the only question here about which there is any dispute; and for such a relatively small hardship as that, I appeal to you, is the Senate justified in making a request to the Commander in Chief of the Army to revoke or suspend an order so vitally necessary in its essentials?

Something has been said here about industries carried on by means of waterpower, and it has been suggested that there is no use shutting them down. It is admitted that there is no law governing them, and only a patriotic appeal is made to those concerned to shut down. If they do not want to shut down, they will not do so; but the President has said in this order that they ought to shut down; that they ought to shut down in the interest of fairness; that they ought to shut down to stop at the source of this congestion of the railroads and the docks. If those are not deemed sufficient reasons, let any man running an industry carried on by water power exercise his right not to follow the request of the Chief Executive.

But when the country realizes and when the other manufacturing interests of this country realize that this water-power man has been requested to do a patriotic thing, that it has been necessary to close down the industries of this country in the preservation of the lives of the people of the country and of our boys in the trenches, if that water-power man wants to disregard that request he will be given a place in history not far removed from that of Benedict Arnold. And so with this man who has coal in his bin, who asserts his right to consume that coal against the judgment of our commander, on whom we have imposed the responsibility of action in this crisis. If he chooses to disregard the order, I apprehend that he will find his surroundings decidedly uncomfortable, at least in the community where he has his factory.

Senators, the provisions of the order to which objection is made are so slight compared with the evils that will result from the passage of this resolution that I appeal to you to hesitate and give calm consideration. We are conducting this war; and admitting that upon the question of legality, admitting that upon the question of shutting down these factories that have coal there might be an honest difference of opinion, admitting that honest minds might differ, what should we do? My judgment is that every patriotic citizen of this country—every Senator, at least—should resolve the doubt in favor of those who are charged with the responsibility.

I believe in holding up the hands of those who are trying to do things. They are serving you and they are serving me. They are trying to preserve this Republic, so that we and our children may live under the benign influences of a democracy. I appeal to you to put no obstacles in the way. Be patriotic to-day; trust those in whom you have reposed your power; and do not let this Senate give aid and comfort to the enemy by saying that we have placed the authority to carry on this war in incompetent hands.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to read a telegram just received from New Orleans which is very pertinent. It is as follows:

JANUARY 17, 1918.

Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The large number of sawmills in Louisiana request that you obtain an immediate ruling from Administrator Garfield as to whether the shut-down order of yesterday is applicable to them. They point out that they do not use coal for fuel in their plants, but use the refuse wood from their own cut, and further point out that they are actual producers of fuel, and that practically the entire population of the various sawmill towns is dependent for its fuel upon the continued operation of the mills. To shut down these mills, instead of increasing the fuel supply, would materially decrease the fuel supply. Moreover, I doubt whether a sawmill is, strictly speaking, a manufacturing plant within the meaning of the order. Besides this, these mills are now producing ship lumbers and other lumber used for the production of ships, and to shut them down will seriously retard the shipbuilding program in this section. I shall appreciate your taking the matter up promptly and using your influence to exempt them from the order.

J. BLANC MONROE.

I will ask the Senator if that matter was discussed with Dr. Garfield; and if so, what he said on the subject; and if it was not discussed, what is the opinion of the Senator on that subject?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I confess that I have not had an opportunity——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senator will permit me first to answer the Senator from Louisiana, I shall be glad then to yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The telegram I have is on the same line, and the Senator can answer both questions at once.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well; then I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have a telegram from one of the largest manufacturing institutions in my State along the line of that presented by the Senator from Louisiana, and I should like, if possible, to have the Senator from New Mexico state whether or not Dr. Garfield gave any explanation of his order as applicable to this plant.

The telegram is as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., January 17, 1918.

Senator JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Washington, D. C.:

Mr. Garfield's order closing down all manufacturing plants except food-producing plants puts us in an awkward position. We are bag manufacturers, making bags for flour and corn meal—food products. We are under contract with mills in Northeast, Middle, and Southern States. How can flour mills run if bag factories are closed down? Our plant is equipped to run with hydroelectric power and not steam. We use coal for heating purposes only, employing between five and six hundred operatives—many families. These people will consume more fuel in daytime than we use in heating. Won't you use your good offices to have us and all bag factories exempted from the order? Kindly wire us, our expense, result.

MORGAN & HAMILTON CO.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have not studied this order sufficiently to give an opinion as to whether or not the industries referred to by either of the two Senators are included within its provisions, but I want to say this: The fact that these telegrams are read here, and the fact that other Senators are receiving a large number of similar telegrams, would indicate the utter hopelessness of the Food Administration giving a hearing to all of these industries before taking action. The women and children will be suffering still. The food and munitions will remain in the harbors. So, even if they are affected, I want to know if the Senators present believe that that is sufficient ground for withholding action upon the great question? It is simply an argument, to a greater or lesser extent, that the industries of this country shall go on as usual.

I want to say here and now that the industries of this country can not go on as usual if this war is to be successfully prosecuted. The $20,000,000,000 which we are proposing to put into it is equivalent to one-half the total production of the country before the war; and to change that energy and the requisite capital to make it effective will require a shifting such as this country has never fully realized. When an argument is made that business shall go on as usual I am not impressed. I know not how to weigh dollars against humanity.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the Senator will pardon me, I think I could suggest a pertinent answer to those telegrams.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be very much obliged to the Senator if he will do so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If I should consult my own safety or my own convenience I would much rather be in Tennessee or Louisiana, or elsewhere in America, with my factory shut down, than in the trenches with my throat cut.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I thank the Senator for the observation. I quite agree with him. That is a very patriotic attitude, and one which I hope I share with him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a moment before the roll is called. I wish to ask the Senator having the resolution in charge whether he will not change the wording so as to read "President of the United States" instead of "Fuel Administrator of the United States"? I think it is very much more becoming for the Senate of the United States to ask this from the President than to ask it from an employee of the Government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I considered that matter somewhat, and I find a division of counsel; but inasmuch as the Fuel Administrator made the order, I think it would be better to let the resolution stand as it is. The wording is not very important.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to take any of the time of the Senate to discuss it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LODGE] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question I withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I feel, as a result of a conversation with his colleague, that I am released from that pair on this question. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I think I might be permitted to vote under my agreement with him; but out of precaution I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I wish to inquire whether the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I do not know how the senior Senator from Michigan would vote on this question, but I am quite sure he would permit the Senator from Missouri to vote, and I so informed him.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] on important public business, and to say that he is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—50.

Bankhead	Hitchcock	Owen	Sutherland
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Poindexter	Swanson
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Thomas
Calder	Kellogg	Reed	Tillman
Cummins	Knox	Saulsbury	Townsend
Curtis	McCumber	Sherman	Underwood
Fernald	McKellar	Shields	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	McLean	Smith, Ga.	Wadsworth
Gallinger	McNary	Smith, Md.	Watson
Gerry	Martin	Smith, S. C.	Weeks
Gore	Nelson	Smoot	Wolcott
Hale	New	Sterling
Harding	Norris	Stone

NAYS—19.

Ashurst	Hardwick	Lewis	Robinson
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Myers	Shafroth
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Sheppard
Fletcher	Kirby	Pittman	Simmons
Gronna	La Follette	Ransdell

NOT VOTING—23.

Broussard	Hollis	Lodge	Thompson
Colt	Hughes	Overman	Trammell
Culberson	James	Page	Walsh
Dillingham	Kendrick	Penrose	Warren
Fall	Kenyon	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
France	King	Smith, Mich.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I have received a number of telegrams during the afternoon bearing on this subject. I send two to the desk. I shall not ask to have them read, but I ask that they be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the telegrams will be printed in the RECORD.

The telegrams are as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO, January 17, 1918.

Senator POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.:

One-third of our factories are operated by natural gas, of which there is abundance. Nothing could be gained by closing these factories, but great hardship would be suffered by the employees. Can you not secure a ruling from the Fuel Board committing factories operated exclusively by natural gas to continue? Am wiring Mr. Garfield.

SUPERIOR GAS ENGINE CO.,
P. J. SHOUVLIN.

CANTON, OHIO, January 17, 1918.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Our furnaces running almost entirely on very large orders for Army, Navy, and medical supply departments. To draw our fires would cause great ruin to muffles and furnaces by cooling down and heat must be kept up to prevent freezing of sprinkler system and keeping them up. No additional fuel will be consumed in utilizing the heat by producing goods solely for Government. Is it possible to have some modification to fuel order? Wire quick.

THE REPUBLIC STAMPING & ENAMELING CO.

CONSIDERATION OF SHIPPING BILLS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is important that we should have a short executive session, as many nominations are to be referred.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator from Alabama withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to three bills on the calendar, the bill (S. 3387) to authorize and empower the President to create military zones around shipyards where vessels are under construction for the United States; the bill (S. 3388) to amend the emergency shipping fund provisions of the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved June 30, 1917, so as to empower the President and his designated agents to take over certain transportation systems for the transportation of shipyard and plant employees, and for other purposes; and the bill (S. 3389) to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes.

These bills have been reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce and it is quite important, as developments have demonstrated, that action should be taken on these bills. I do not think it will require a great deal of time to dispose of them. I wish to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to take them up at the very first opportunity.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ARRAIGNMENT OF THE KAISER.

By order of the Senate the following matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in brevier:

WILLIAM II, WE INDICT YOU, EVEN IN THE PURPLE.

[An Arraignment, by Siegfried Balder.]

For years you prepared the world war with deliberate premeditation. In the summer of 1914, without the least provocation, you ruthlessly created the pretext. You threw to the winds all warnings, and those who by their counsels wished to hold you back from war you drove from you. In a breach of solemn treaties you burst without excuse into a peaceful country whose neutrality you were bound to observe and protect. After driving your people into the war, you did them desperate injury in a military way, as well as by perverse disciplinary measures, especially by the choice of incompetent generals, who were known to be incompetent. You conduct the war in the most barbarous fashion, infringing upon the obligations and principles of international law. To your people and their representatives who trustfully looked up to you and your Government you have lied and you still lie on and on concerning the actual events before the war and after it began concerning your own intentions as well as the causes, purpose, and goal of the war. You constantly infringe upon the rights, the laws, and the constitutional liberties of your people. You disrupt family ties, destroy business and its interchanges and intercourse, and the best men of your people who know the truth and speak it you put behind the bars. You continue to prevent the making of peace because you are too cowardly to take your guilt upon your own head and to assume the consequences of your deeds.

Never has a more ruthless crime cried to heaven for revenge!

Millions of young men in the flush of their youth and millions of men once content with their peaceful occupations lie mutilated beyond recognition upon the battle fields of Europe; thousands lie on the bottom of the sea. You murdered them!

Millions of widows, millions of poor orphans weep for their provider, for husband or father to protect them from danger and want, to bring them up, to comfort them, to counsel them.

Millions of girls pine away in grief and sorrow because their sweethearts have fallen on the battle fields of Flanders and Poland.

Millions of cripples, robbed of an arm, a leg, or even of the blessed light of day, are doomed to lifelong existence in wretchedness, a burden alike to themselves and to their fellows. You robbed them of fortune, strength, health, and happiness!

Whole countrysides cry for expiation, their acres blasted, the fostering earth gaping with wounds from shells beyond reckoning, the toil and energy of generations destroyed. Cities and villages, once the homes of busy, happy people, now lie in smoke-blackened ruins and accuse you before Heaven.

Sanctimonious hypocrite that you are, you have blasphemed the Almighty and have called upon Him to bear witness to your lies and to be the advocate of your misdeeds!

Your hapless people are starving, yet you command that they be hewn down if their complaints reach your ears.

The men of your people are forced to live in gruesome wreckage, in pits and shell craters, to freeze to death in the snows of inhospitable mountains, and to bleed their lives slowly away on barbed-wire obstacles, more pitiable than the most wretched galley slaves of antiquity. Thousands are driven forward into a hell of shrapnel and machine-gun fire in order to occupy a useless stretch of trenches in a country which does not concern us, and which we do not wish to possess. Thousands fall and thousands are shoved in after them.

Germany's civilization you have annihilated; Germany's honor you have trampled in the dust. All the people who once loved and respected us turn from us with abhorrence and decline to have anything to do with men who break treaties, who outrage civilization, who commit murder.

For 28 months this state of gruesome horror has continued, conjured up by you. When will you put an end to it? What have you to reply? Answer.

THE ACCUSED AND HIS ENVIRONMENT.

From your youth you have known no interests except hunting and fighting—murder of beast and murder of man. Millions of your subjects have never seen you—either in person or in likeness—except in the garb of a hunter or of a warrior. Dressed as a hunter you went afield to slaughter en masse the animals which were beaten up for you to kill. Your bloodthirsty recreation was slaying stags and does in herds, shooting down more than a thousand helpless pheasants in one day—in company with your friend Franz Ferdinand of Austria.

When one of the authors of these lines saw you for the first time, in the summer of 1888, a few months after you ascended the throne, you were inspecting your booty of stags and wild boars. Your sacrifice lay arranged in lines and columns like soldiers, and with dark mien, using the Prussian goose step, you were reviewing them, fixing each object with your eye, as if to say: "Behold, thus will I slay mine enemies."

We saw you often, but whether on festive or on sad occasions it was always in the character of a Roman Cæsar.

The whole of all your mind can note
Is how he coughs or clears his throat.

"Hoc volo, sic jubeo, stat pro ratione voluntas"; "Nemo me impune lacessit"; "Regis voluntas suprema lex." ("This is my wish; thus do I command; my will, not the dictates of reason." "Wha daur meddle wi' me?" "The will of the King is the supreme law.") These were the pronouncements of more sovereign natures; they did not come from your puny brain; but that you should borrow them for your own use speaks volumes for him who can read men's hearts. A strutting turkey cock, stuck full of false feathers to make him look like an imperator.

The swearing in of recruits, the dedication of regimental standards, the launching of war ships, receptions to generals, the celebration of the anniversaries of battles, the unveiling of monuments to your soldier forefathers—on such occasions you made lofty addresses on the duties of soldiers and the rights of commanders, on the destruction of your enemies, battles and flashing swords, and the splendid achievements of your glorious ancestors. The achievements of the Hohenzollern, however, have been won on bloody battle fields, not in the peaceful workshops of the citizen, the scholar, or the artist.

Officers were your tutors, your advisers, your companions in recreation and pleasure.

While all other civilized nations watch jealously to see that the sword never arrogates to itself preponderance in the State, but remains a voiceless tool of the civil government—to be used only in case of direst necessity—with you the sword was always dictator in all branches of the Government. We laughed when in England and France bankers, merchants, and journalists were appointed ministers of war and navy; we ought rather to have wept that our chancellors, secretaries of state, ministers, diplomats, and presidents of Government boards were chosen by you from the ranks of generals and families of generals.

The best of your thought and effort was directed toward increasing the army and navy without regard to national welfare, or to the economic and political situation. It was always Germany which led the way in this respect; our neighbors followed suit only with the greatest reluctance and under compulsion. Their distrust was justified, for against whom could our gigantic preparations by land and sea be directed except themselves?

Besides the generals there grew branches of a still worse kind from the poisonous tree of militarism, who had their say in your Government—the army supply houses. At their head the firm of Krupp, with which for many years you have been associated, not only in personal friendship but even—strange to say—through financial debit and credit. It was because of this connection, and not on account of the quality of their cannon, which others could make as well, that this firm was everywhere given preference. Your purple protected the firm even against the processes of the law. Have you forgotten the lawsuit that attracted so much attention a few years ago, which arose because the Krupps had themselves informed by imperial officials through improper means concerning the bids of other firms in order to be able to underbid them—or as might also be said, in order not to underbid their competitors any more than was necessary in order to get the contract? The civil judges found the officers of the firm guilty and imposed a prison sentence upon them. The military tribunal, however, freed those convicted of the same crime who came under their jurisdiction because of their military rank. Was this "judicial conviction" or "loyalty to the supreme war lord"?

It has probably not escaped you either that the Krupps, the principal support of your military propaganda by land and sea, as they were likewise the leading agency in poisoning and bribing our "well-disposed" press and public opinion, were delivering weapons to our "enemies" cheaper even than to our German fatherland from sheer unselfish and exalted patriotism. Thus, before the war, this firm sold nickel-plated steel for armor plate at 1,920 marks ($480) per ton to foreign countries, and at 2,320 marks ($580), with 400 marks ($100) special profit per ton to the German military and naval authorities.

How charming was the story of the Liege cannon, which the Krupps, even in August, 1914, openly published in the German papers as one of their achievements. In the spring of 1914 the firm had contracted for about 200,000,000 francs' worth ($4,000,000) of Liege artillery to be delivered to Belgium, and already had the purchase price in its hands, although it had not shipped the cannon on account of alleged transport difficulties. It was the German Army that provided for the delivery of these cannon to Belgium. From this story it is evident (1) that Belgium had so little thought of war with Germany that it not only innocently ordered its weapons in Germany but had not even pressed for the delivery of the cannon which had already been paid for; (2) that the private firm of Krupp knew not only of the coming of the war months in advance, but had also learned the secret plan to attack through Belgium. From whom? And who pocketed the 200,000,000 francs for the undelivered goods?

The business of these giant profiteers was the object of your care, out of regard for these profiteers you prepared for war, through them you poisoned the press and public opinion, for these profiteers the noblest and the strongest of our Nation are bled white.

Emperor William, do you, the personified representative of militarism, of the brutal policy of the mailed fist, do you seriously expect us to believe that you are the innocent little lamb which had to defend itself because others wanted to fall upon Germany—upon Germany, the bugbear of them all? Very well, we wait upon you with the further facts.

THE PREPARATIONS FOR THE DEED.

It is untrue that you have kept the peace for Germany since the beginning of your government. This would have been no credit to you, anyway, for no one ever intended to attack us.

You involved us quite unnecessarily in a war with China, and in another of several years' duration with the Hereros in Southwest Africa—unnecessarily, for we should have gained far more with China through a peaceful agreement about railroad and mining concessions, and in Southwest Africa by a sensible native policy, to the operation of which, to be sure, your archaristocratic diplomats and colonial governors, with their military training, are not at all adapted. We will not discuss the lesser campaigns in Kamerun and in East Africa.

But it was not your fault, Swashbuckler, that war was avoided in other cases; credit is due to the peaceful disposition of all our neighbors and to the feeling of personal responsibility on the part of our former imperial chancellor. Indeed, Prince Bülow, in November, 1908, had to admonish you and expose you before the German people in a public session of the Reichstag, because through your insane meddling in the politics of other nations you had from minute to minute threatened the peace of the world incalculably and had tainted the honor of Germany. At the end of the last century a conflict broke out between England and the Boers, and through your Kruger dispatches and your reception of Oom Paul Kruger in Berlin you incited the Boers to resistance against the British demands (questions of economic and domestic policies were the subjects of disagreement between the Boer farmers and the British miners and business men in the Transvaal and Orange Free State), and through their confidence in your assistance you encouraged the war, to say the least. When the war broke out you sent the British general staff a plan of campaign against the Boers worked out by yourself. Like the most tattered vagabond of the Middle Ages who one day offered his services to a robber knight and on the morrow to his opponent, just for the pleasure of getting into a fight, destitute of all shame and sense of honor or propriety, not to mention political insight—even thus does a German Emperor act!

To gain martial laurels, to increase the "fame of the Hohenzollern," to witness a sham battle with loaded weapons, and a cavalry charge against a "real enemy"—these were the goals of your ambition. Yet since your statesmen—until Bethmann-Holweg—were not so brainless as to risk the fortune of the German nation for such a reason, you undertook to carry out your war policies on your own account.

In default of another "enemy," you picked as a victim France, our old so-called "archenemy," whose ghost now haunts only Prussian lieutenants. A crazy notion! Thirty years ago, ever since the fall of Boulanger, the Republic of France ceased to pursue a policy of hostility to Germany and avoided any conflict with her mighty neighbor on the east.

The little faction, which still cried "Revenge," "à la Déroulède," though they were of about as much importance as the old Prussian-eater Sigl in Munich, died out long ago. Germans were welcome guests in Paris; numerous German firms had established themselves there and throughout the country; crowds of German artists and students made this focus of European culture the goal of their pilgrimages. The great leaders in science, art, and literature in France and Germany were in active contact, both personal and through correspondence. The works of the great German composers were performed in the greatest houses in France, often, indeed, under German directors and by German singers, just as French works were to be found on the programs of the German theater.

A Pégoud was received with enthusiasm on German aviation fields. French music lovers flocked to the celebrations in Bayreuth, Munich, and Oberammergau. Creations from Paris adorned the display windows of the great German fashion shops. Both in France and in Germany everything was tending toward a true, unforced friendship between these two powers—the greatest centers of civilized progress on the continent of Europe—and it was truly one of the most difficult achievements of your court diplomacy and intrigue to break up the peaceful relationship existing between these two nations.

You bent every effort to accomplish this laborious task.

There were absolutely no causes for friction between Germany and France in the whole world, except in Morocco, which borders upon the French North African colonies. This country was disturbing the French colonial territory by the contentions of its various rival sultans to the detriment of important French commercial interests in North Africa. Now, it was impossible for French domination in Morocco to injure us Germans. On the contrary, it would have been an advantage to us, since it gave promise of an orderly government and provided an outlet for France's political interests. We had no more reason to meddle with them than the French had to interfere—which they refrained from doing—in our colonial adventures and conquests in Africa or anywhere else.

Nevertheless you used the mining interests of a single German firm—the Mannesmann Bros.—as your pretext for three times shaking the peace of Europe to its foundations, namely, in the three crises in Morocco of 1905, 1909, and 1911. Of course these German interests could easily have been safeguarded by a treaty with France. They were not worth the blood of a single German day laborer; yet out of them, in default of a better pretext, you thrice tried to kindle war.

In each case peace was preserved against your will by the unvarying resourcefulness and superiority of French and English diplomacy. Bülow fell because he was not willing to follow your war policies through thick and thin. You then took on Bethmann-Holweg as imperial chancellor, with the understanding that he should pull off the war for you and stand ready as a dummy editor to be responsible for it. He went cheerfully at his task, and in 1911 he sprang the third Morocco crisis with the visit of the Panther to Agadir. Once again war was prevented, this time through the president of the Reichsbank, Dr. Koch, who was man enough to oppose your lust for war in the name of the Rischsbank and of German political economy. The German people owe it to him and to the patient forbearance of the French Government that war was then prevented even at the eleventh hour, when the German warships were already under full steam, and the freight cars on the German railroads had been emptied and were standing ready for loads of soldiers expected to arrive during the night. Dr. Koch was dismissed, and the Prussian official Havenstein was appointed as "imperial money marshal," in order to prepare the state bank and state monetary affairs for war, much to the detriment of German economic conditions, which since that time have suffered under constant pressure.

But it was all no use. The contemptible policy of insult and persecution in Alsace-Lorraine—the "Col. Reuter" and "Lieut. Forstner" affairs, along with the crown prince's telegram, "Keep at 'em, boys!" and the acquittal of the offenders by military court-martial announced in advance—these attempts quite naturally caused the French people some uneasiness, and their peace-loving souls were put upon the rack, so to speak; but the French Government did not permit itself to depart by a hair's breadth from its carefully considered adherence to a peaceful policy.

Some other artifice, accordingly, had to be contrived to bring about the fulfillment of your fondest desire—grand military maneuvers in France with an imposing entry of the Emperor into Paris as a climax. As side partner in this plan you were to have the Austrian heir apparent, Franz Ferdinand, a butcher of game, with the airs of a Cæsar, and more good for nothing outside the army than you are.

As Austria is a nobody in its standing among the great powers, this tyrant had hitherto been able to terrify with his swashbuckling, not the world, but only his little neighbor, Serbia. The latter country is cut off from the sea, and therefore, since it is compelled to use the Danube route for its entire commerce, particularly in exporting its cattle, grain, and other agricultural products, it is thrown upon the tender mercies of Austria. Although formerly the relations between Austria and Serbia had been the best imaginable—the officers in Semlin and Belgrade, for instance, invited each other to their balls and other festivities—Franz Ferdinand, with his courtiers, kept inventing new methods to show by continually vexing humiliations the "superiority" of Austria over her little neighbor.

In order to put an end to this insufferable oppression Serbia joined the Balkan league and in 1912 entered the Balkan war against Turkey with the purpose of gaining access to the Adriatic Sea through the mountains of Albania. This was a war with a real goal, one which represented a vital problem for the Serbian people, and which could be achieved without any detriment to the civilized world. For even if the sons of the mountains of Albania exchanged Turkish for Serbian rule, and if inconsiderable settlements along the east coast of the Adriatic developed into harbor cities of commercial importance, this at least was no loss to civilization. And after heroic battles the brave Serbs attained their goal by occupying the harbors of Durazzo and San Giovanni di Medua. Although this success caused no one in Austria-Hungary the least inconvenience—on the contrary, prosperous development of a neighboring nation is always a gain for one's own country as well—the Austrian heir apparent—the actual ruler of Austria—now mobilized and kept on rattling his sword until the treaty of London founded the phantom kingdom of Albania, an abortion of European diplomatic art. The sole purpose was again to shut off Serbia from an outlet to the sea, and thus to rob her of the fruits of her victories and the goal of her war. The Austrian mobilization lasted many months and brought Austria, which was not rich anyway, to the verge of bankruptcy, and all for nothing at all except to satisfy a Cæsar's itch for power. The great powers—Russia, England, and France—consented to humor this despot in the London conference simply and solely for the sake of avoiding a war.

After this "triumph" affronts to poor Serbia followed thick and fast. Bulgaria, now allied with Turkey, was encouraged not to acquiesce in the terms of peace arranged at London, and the upshot of the matter was the second Balkan war, in 1913. The outcome, as we all know, was not a triumph for Bulgaria. More sword rattling, therefore, from the Austrian heir apparent because Serbia had received a few more Macedonian villages by the treaty of Bucharest than seemed proper, according to the ideas of this fount of all authority. Austria at that time—midsummer, 1913—made an official inquiry of Giolitti, the president of the Italian ministry, as to whether Italy would consider herself bound by the terms of the triple alliance in case Austria were attacked by Russia in consequence of war with Serbia. Giolitti, who is now known to be discredited among his countrymen on account of his friendly attitude toward the triple alliance, answered quite properly:

> If Austria proceeds against Serbia, it is evident that the terms of the triple alliance do not apply. It would be an independent action on Austria's own account, since it is not a question of self-defense, and no one considers attacking her.

He added also the well-meant wish that Germany, he hoped, might succeed in deterring Austria from this extremely hazardous adventure.

Well, after your Morocco experiment ended in a fiasco, this extremely hazardous adventure was the diplomatic war plan concocted between you and your friend Franz Ferdinand in continual visits to Konopischt and other hunting castles. Sometimes your statesmen and confidential strategists were admitted to these counsels, sometimes not.

Perhaps you will prefer to deny this. Have a caution, the walls have ears, and in Austria there are not only hunting attendants who gossip about State secrets but even officers of the general staff.

Your noble plan ran like this: Serbia, exhausted by the two Balkan wars, to be taken by surprise and easily crushed to earth; Russia to interfere on behalf of her little Slavic sister nation; this (ostensibly) to involve Germany under the terms of her alliance with Austria, and now France has to join the fray on Russia's account, and at last you two can fight battles and win victories to your heart's content!

What do the welfare and happiness of the people amount to after all in comparison with the laurels of victory.

Nineteen hundred and thirteen was too soon for the plan to be put through. First the armament bill, which had just been passed, had to be carried out with the extra billion appropriation for defense. You and your friend accordingly had to wait patiently till 1914.

Your plan certainly seemed most attractive not only from a diplomatic point of view but from a military one also, did it not?

For many years past, at least since 1897, the following plot against France, sprung from the brain of Count Haessler, lay in the secret archives of the general staff:

A German Army, to make a feint attack on the Alsace-Lorraine boundary and withdraw, as if defeated, far enough into the interior to form a great semicircle between the fortresses of Metz and Strassburg.

The French, elevated at the chance of regaining Alsace, to be enticed into this hollow arc. Then German reserves, which have been held in readiness on the flanks to press forward eastward from Metz and westward from Strassburg and cut off the French forces in the field from their base, the chain of fortresses formed by Verdun, Toul, Epinal, and Belfort, and prepare for them a new Sedan.

Meanwhile the main German Army will march through Luxembourg and Belgium and fall upon the hereditary enemy's country along the extended front across the almost unprotected northern boundary of France. With the army on the left wing, it will surround and storm the great fortress of Verdun, which bars the way from Metz to Paris, while in the meantime the other army columns will hasten by forced marches toward Paris. As soon as the main supply line from Metz to Paris is opened through the fall of Verdun—about six weeks after the beginning of the war, according to the plan—the neutrality of Belgium is to be restored. Paris to be bombarded after the fashion of Liege with our superior artillery (Big Berthas!) and taken by storm, and four weeks after the beginning of the war the great Imperator makes his triumphal entry. "On the anniversary of Sedan, I expect to breakfast in the Café de la Paix in Paris," announced Count Haessler in the early days of the war. "When the leaves fall the Landstrum will be coming home," you told us. The rest of the troops, you meant us to understand, would still be needed to occupy the country till the war indemnity was paid.

The plot for the east, hatched out by the Austrian general staff in 1911 or 1912, was just as ingenious. While east and west Prussia and Bukowina are protected solely by the defensive operations of the Landwehr and Landsturm troops, the main Austrian Army stationed along the Galician boundary will march toward the Vistula in a wide curve and occupy Poland until the German and Austrian boundary from east Prussia to east Galicia forms a handsome straight line, such as you are so fond of at parade. Before the stupid Russians are finally mobilized, a matter of about six weeks, the Polish forts will be crumpled up with the help of 42, 30, and 5 centimeter batteries, and Poland, which longs for deliverance from the Russian yoke anyway, conquered. "We only need to add Warsaw to our conquests, and the war will be finished," were your own words in the fall of 1914.

Some prince or other—one of your sons, if possible—is to become King of Poland. France will pay the cost of the war, including, of course, our indemnity to Belgium, which, considering its military helplessness, must permit our passing through without further ceremony. Perhaps there will be a French colony left over for us also. After a war lasting three months at the most you return home in triumph, amid the acclamations of your people. Once more, with the help of your military and Junker caste, you have saved Germany from destruction! You plan new armament for land and sea—now, of course, we have to prepare against two countries which want revenge—and you collect your percentage of profit from the millions the Krupps have made.

That was your plan of war, your war goal.

Who will ask why the widows weep, and the orphans and the cripples? They will stop if you pay them. Who will ask who is to bear the guilt of the war? To be guilty means to be the cause of misfortune. But a victorious war is in your eyes no misfortune for any nation.

FLAWS IN THE PLAN.

An enchanting plan in the east and west! Of course, we can not consider it in its political aspects, from the point of view of national welfare; this point must wait till later. It was intended merely as a military scheme, war for the sake of war. But even from this point of view it contained some flaws which deserve consideration; for instance:

(1) The whole scheme of the war as planned by the general staff rests upon an error; it is impossible to put up a war in hermetically sealed tins like corned beef, or wind it up on a bobbin like a spool in a sewing machine. War is not a thing which can be predetermined and settled in advance. For one thing, the opponent always sets your plans awry, a thing which it is vain to attempt to eliminate by the greatest possible precipitation in beginning the war, extreme haste in mobilization, and utmost vigor in the first offensive. Then, too, the very nature of one's own people, their psychological make-up, their economic situation, the kind of political leaders they follow, and the temperament of the generals who are available for service at the outbreak of the war, all these are factors which influence the military situation from the very beginning, and thus should be taken into consideration in making plans. The Bavarians, ever at the forefront in patriotic sacrifices, and the men of Baden and Wurttemberg, quick as they are to perceive any danger threatening their own country, can not be ordered into Lorraine out of hand when the idea is not to expel the invading French but to entice them in.

(2) The plan of campaign, it should be particularly noted, can not be separated from the generals. One can not bestow their strategic plans upon crown princes like distinctions "pour le mérite." Moreover, field generalship is a more rare and difficult art than is, for instance, bobsleigh coasting.

Not even the fine name of Hellmuth Moltke is an unconditional guaranty of victory.

To be a Moltke is essential; to be called Moltke amounts to nothing. When you conferred the post of chief of the general staff upon Moltke 10 years ago, he himself informed you he was not qualified. You assigned it to him—about as one orders a subaltern to sentry duty—with the words, "Well, you are equal to this bit of a job in peace times; in war I am the supreme source of command, anyway." Have you forgotten that so soon?

You are responsible for the sins of the princes whom you chose as generals, as well as for the shortcomings of your chief of the general staff. Crown princes, in other words, inexperienced, but conceited and influential men, not only make a botch of the business intrusted to them but in so doing they set a bad example to others. Gen. von Kluck declared in the beginning of September, 1914, that he did not worry himself about the commands of the general staff; since the German Crown Prince did not worry about them, he did not see why he should bother!

You are acquainted, I take it, with the state of affairs in the conduct of your armies which led to the retirement of Moltke, Kluck, and Hausen, and to the abdication of the post of quartermaster general by Von Stein, and so forth?

(3) You calculated that easy-going, slovenly Austria, divided as it is into a dozen hostile peoples, would make the same military material as your Prussians. Did you think that the Czechs, Poles, Croatians, and Ruthenians of the Austrian Army would fight with Prussian smartness and discipline against brothers of their own race to the north and to the south, people who had been surprised by an arbitrary and malicious attack? They were entirely justified in deserting to the other side by thousands at every opportunity which offered itself, instead of standing up to be shot down at the whim of a Hohenzollern. Any general ought to be hanged who does not know that his soldiers are flesh and blood, and not so many tin soldiers. Just because you carry on war, not with mercenaries, but with a nation called to arms, it is necessary that the goal of the war be in harmony with the ideas and interests of the nation, not with the ruler's silly lust for power.

(4) What if Belgium had not granted your army right of way through her country?

Belgium was no ordinary neutral State, which can waive or limit its neutrality at any moment it sees fit, and toward which a belligerent is allowed by international law to behave as he likes. Its neutrality was of a wholly different sort—a fact which was always concealed from the German people. Prussia, Austria, England, and France guaranteed the neutrality of Belgium under the sanctions of international law in the treaty of London, 1839, and until the beginning of this war you yourself, through your Government, have always recognized this guaranty as a binding pledge. Besides this, in his speech of August 4, 1914, your chancellor admitted that the entrance upon Belgian territory was a violation of the statutes of international law.

The march of troops through a neutral country on their way to war is one of the most serious breaches of neutrality; if it is allowed, it automatically permits the opposing party to march in, and thus the neutral country is made the theater of war. "The violation of the neutrality of Belgium would be the most shameful crime upon the pages of the world's history," said Gladstone, the English Prime Minister in Parliament, at the outbreak of war in 1870. Bismarck at that time observed Belgian neutrality so punctiliously that he would not even permit German wounded or medical attendants to be transported across Belgian territory after the battle of Sedan. Belgium dared not grant permission to march through, upon the penalty of being guilty of a breach of treaty, and thus of losing for all time its honor and respect among the nations. The rest of the guarantor powers were under no necessity of granting permission to march through Belgium, but were bound to hurry to her aid, if she demanded it. Our treaty with Belgium was as good and as binding as any other State treaty, as, for instance, the triple alliance. By tearing up this treaty, you relieved all other nations of their engagements toward us, as Salandra quite rightly pointed out on the occasion of Italy's declaration of war. By a faithless attack upon a small, weak nation you alienated the sympathies of the entire world from us at the very beginning, and confirmed them to our opponents. But most important of all, by this action you forced England—who has always fulfilled her treaties—to enter the war upon Belgium's demand for protection, and to fight at least until Belgium's independence is again restored, and until the damage which has been done to her is repaired, in so far as this is possible at all. And this alone was England's reason for declaring war upon us.

Your subterfuges, such as that Belgium itself, or France, or England had already violated Belgium's neutrality are gross lies, as you very well know, meant only to deceive your own people. No one except yourself compromised Belgian neutrality. France answered immediately with a simple "Yes" Grey's question of July 31, 1914, as to whether it would respect the neutrality of Belgium in a war with Germany as long as no other power violated it. You sent the rotten answer through your secretary of state, Jagow, that "you could not answer the question, because of the necessity of not disclosing your plan of war." By those words the English query was answered and your plan of war stripped bare. And the English Ambassador Goschen, at the instance of his Government, immediately directed Bethmann-Hollweg's attention most forcibly to the inevitable consequences.

You therefore also have England's war against Germany upon your conscience, and for it you are answerable to your nation.

Likewise you are responsible for our losing the sympathies of foreign countries from the very start and for the breaking of treaties of alliance and friendship with Italy and Roumania.

(5) If one wants to carry on war it is, of course, well to prepare for it. This preparation should not, however, be carried on for so long a time, so strikingly, and so exhaustively that even the stupidest neighbor must have noticed it long since. Ever since 1905—the first Morocco affair—the sharp-eyed English noted not merely that you were looking for war with France, but also that you wanted in that case to make a surprise attack through Belgium, a course which would involve English treaty obligations and interests. Perhaps you think nobody noticed it when the officers of your general staff, even though disguised as tourists, studied the Franco-Belgian boundary. Acting upon this, the British also studied the defenses of Belgium and made the Barnardiston military agreements which you found in Brussels and published in a garbled form. These in all cases contain the proviso, "If another power violates the neutrality of Belgium." These agreements prove nothing against Belgium, nothing against England; they merely show that even at that time you had in mind a war involving the violation of the neutrality of Belgium. Or do you prefer to try to make us believe that you invaded Belgium on account of these military agreements, although their existence was entirely unknown to you? No; the opposite, rather, is the case. You would not have made the invasion if you had suspected how pluckily the little country would defend itself and how stubbornly it would be aided by England in its resistance.

The nearer the war came the more your military preparations increased, as was evident to all acquainted with such matters; increases in the army and navy, including the notorious billion-mark appropriation bill of 1913; added severity in military and espionage laws; continued secret meetings of German and Austrian high officials of state, statesmen, and chiefs of staff; feverish activity in all military industries; simultaneous increase in the burden of commercial credits and foreign exchange; uninterrupted purchases of gold by the Reichsbank; the founding of the German Wehrverein (Defense Union, 1912) and increased agitation in the Navy League; war talk in the yellow journals and a systematic manipulation of the civil press for war purposes; sensational books by the Crown Prince and by various generals (Bernhardi, Frobenius) as propaganda to influence public opinion for war; laws of all kinds preparatory to war; diplomatic machinations for the sake of tricking England into neutrality in case of a war; the establishment of headquarters for German spies, for example, in Alexandria; all sorts of secret indications pointing to war, in military barracks and in the mustering of reserve troops; copious subsidies to owners of automobiles and motor trucks, in order to be able to count on having as many of these vehicles as possible in case of war.

A few gems, by way of illustration: In Bavaria there was no "state-of-war" law. During previous wars in Bavaria no necessity had arisen for any such gag law by which, in case of war, public opinion is completely muzzled, and the entire civil government, business and trade, law, and order are subjected to military dictatorship. In 1912 a law of this kind, carefully patterned after that of Prussia, was introduced in Bavaria with as little fuss as possible. About the same time, Ludwig, the Prince Regent, who was conducting the government for the mentally unbalanced King Otto, was elevated to the kingship, with the assent of the dominant party in Bavaria, the Center, which up to this time had declared this legally impossible. Your influence was responsible for that action, the reason being that the King controls mobilization, according to the Bavarian constitution, and there were considerable doubts on constitutional grounds as to whether the Prince Regent possessed this qualification in place of the King. Ludwig III, the avaricious miser, welcomed with no little delight a great increase in his civil list (from a few hundred thousand marks to more than 5,000,000), and even expressed willingness to have a further increase in it.

In the spring of 1914 the last preparations were made; everywhere collections were taken up in great numbers for the "Red Cross in war times." From May 10 until June 20 the German Crown Prince, with the chief of the general staff, Moltke, and a number of other generals in high command, made a tour of inspection along the entire boundary between France and Belgium, and of course did not fail to tell tales out of school everywhere. In braggadocio he out bombasts even you, and not for nothing has he studied the war plan in the general staff. Walls have ears. At ports, such as Cuxhaven, barbed wire entanglements were laid out and grass sown over them so that by the beginning of the war the wires were concealed by tall grass. In Alsace-Lorraine observation towers for the artillery were built in suitable places for use in the great battle which was to encircle and cut off the enemy, and so forth.

Again, the Russians had been familiar with the Austrian war plan for more than a year, through Col. Redl, of the Austrian general staff. It is therefore little wonder that the statesmen of France and Russia, who are naturally not entirely blind, recognized your purposes, and in the spring of 1914 began certain defensive measures for the protection of their people, such as, for instance, the strengthening of garrisons along the boundaries and of boundary fortifications and the calling out of reservists for training. They knew that you would let loose a war upon them, the date alone they could not foresee.

That England must enter the war, by reason of her treaty obligations, her interests, and her common duty to humanity, was well known to you and to your counselors. But you did not let this thought trouble you. Our coasts are so well protected by land fortifications, outlying fortified islands, and mines that, even apart from our high seas fleet, a luxury as expensive as it is superfluous, an attempt on the part of the British to make a landing is practically impossible. The English field forces, however, were treated as a mere trifle. You arranged with your Turkish friends to promise Egypt as a reward to the Sultan for his declaring a holy war of the Mohammedans after England entered the war. As a result such violent uprisings were to be brought about in India and Egypt that the English would require all their land forces to protect their own colonies.

You fool! Didn't you know, and didn't the advisors you picked out know that England is the most stubborn and persistent nation in the world; that for centuries she has consistently succeeded in getting what she was fighting for and has enlarged her world power, while exactly the opposite can be asserted of our Austrian allies? Do you follow the advice of hectoring montebanks that you treat England as a nobody, to be turned over to the Turks to subdue "en passant" as incidental to a war with Russia, France, Serbia, and Belgium?

THE DECLARATION OF WAR.

Unhappy Serbia in the spring of 1914 saw herself destined to be the inevitable victim of the threatening world war. If her statesmen did not themselves know Austria's plans, then the Russian Ambassador Hartwig, in Belgrade, enlightened them. In the face of this terrible catastrophe Serbian patriots seized upon the last desperate expedient. They killed the Austrian heir apparent, Franz Ferdinand, in Serajevo on the 28th of June, 1914. By so doing they struck at the man who was the source whence all humiliating trickery had come upon their country, and they believed that they had destroyed the mainspring of the war that threatened them. They calculated that the old Emperor Franz Josef, now in his eighty-fourth year, and the heir to the throne, Archduke Karl Franz Josef, 27 years of age and not a warrior, would not let loose a war—a world war whose consequences for Austria would be incalculable.

Murdering princes is as little to be encouraged as murdering other men. Yet, if the Serbian patriots had succeeded in what they purposed they would have rendered humanity an enormous service and deserved a martyr's crown.

But they had reckoned without you, in ignorance of the fact that Austrian foreign diplomacy had degenerated into a passive tool for the accomplishment of your unbridled desires.

Had Franz Ferdinand not been killed, the world would have held him equally guilty with you; now the charge lies at your feet alone. Franz Josef, a dessicated mummy, acting solely at your command, could hardly have been aware of the full significance of his actions when he signed the ultimatum and then the declaration of war against Serbia. You had already relieved him of the necessity of making any other declarations of war.

"A clear course and straight sailing at last!" Now you had the most splendid reason for war: To avenge the murder of your friend! To be sure it was a reason for war only in the eyes of such infatuated fools as unfortunately most of your subjects were.

Suppose, for instance, some members of the Stuttgart Chapter of the Alpine Club had agreed among themselves to murder a high-handed individual who was dealing treacherously with the Alpine Club—because he looked upon the Alps merely as his hunting preserves, not as vacation spots for peaceable tourists—would this have been a reason for waging war against Wurttemberg? Since when has a country or a nation been responsible for the crimes of some of its subjects? Did anyone declare war against Switzerland or against Italy after the Austrian Empress Elizabeth was murdered in Geneva by an Italian? According to what statute in international, state, or private law may whole nations be slaughtered in revenge for the murder of one prince? Not only the people to which the murderer belongs, but also one's own people, for in war, as you probably know, the shooting is not on one side only; they shoot back.

At the beginning of July, shortly after the murder of the heir to the throne, the Austrian ambassador in Belgrade, Baron Giesl, invited the Russian Ambassador Hartwig into conference. At this conference Hartwig "died." According to the code of Austro-German diplomats, whose ideas on such subjects never emerge from the undergraduate stage, the murder of an ambassador is an affront to a State which can be wiped out only by war. You reckoned that Russia would now have to declare war upon Austria; then Germany would be involved by the terms of her alliance with Austria, and by the same token France by her alliance with Russia. Russia spoiled your plans with diplomatic adroitness by certifying through some Serbian doctors that the ambassador had died of apoplexy.

Nevertheless, you were determined not to allow the war to slip through your fingers.

On July 23, 1914, at 6 p. m., Austria's ultimatum was delivered to the Serbian Government, allowing 48 hours for a reply. It contained in its 10 points such a list of humiliations and encroachments upon Serbia's sovereign rights as has never before been presented to an independent state by a foreign Government (including the right to form associations and hold meetings, education, police, the army, the government of the state, judicial authority.) Notwithstanding this the Serbian Government did not reject the ultimatum, but acceded immediately to eight points, under the influence of Russia, England, and France, in order to preserve the peace of Europe. On one point (the participation of Austrian functionaries in suppressing the Pan-Serbian movement) she asked in most polite terms for a further explanation, where the wording of the Austrian note was undeniably obscure. At the same time she declared her readiness "to accept all cooperation which would be compatible with the principles of international law and of criminal procedure, as well as with neighborly relations." Finally on one point—the participation of Austrian functionaries in the judicial investigation of the accomplices living in Serbia (it should be noticed that the principal conspirators in Serajevo, i. e., Austrian territory, were arrested and dealt with)—the Serbian Government replied:

"The Royal Government, of course, considers it its duty to institute an investigation concerning all persons who were concerned in the conspiracy, or who are said to have been concerned in it, and who are within its territory. In regard to the participation of specially delegated functionaries of the Royal and Imperial (Austrian) Government in this investigation, however, it can not accept such a proposal, since such a thing would be a violation of the constitution and of the criminal code. On the other hand, reports concerning the results of the investigation might, in individual cases, be made to the Austro-Hungarian functionaries."

The Serbian Government went so far as to add: "The Royal Serbian Government believes that out of regard for the common interests of both parties, overhasty, precipitious action should be avoided in seeking a settlement of this affair. Therefore, in case the Austrian Government should consider this answer unsatisfactory, the Royal Serbian Government is ready as always to accept a peaceful settlement, either by submitting this question for decision to the International Court of Arbitration at The Hague or to the great powers."

This was Serbia's answer to the Austrian ultimatum, and it was delivered punctually within the appointed time to the Austrian ambassador in Belgrade. Two hours later the Austrian ambassador left Belgrade, but the German people were deceived with the lie that Serbia had brusquely rejected Austria's ultimatum.

In the following days the ministers of foreign affairs in Russia and in England, Sasonoff and Sir Edward Grey, were feverishly trying to keep peace with the world, and to settle the essentially insignificant points of difference between Austria and Serbia, either by negotiations between Austria and Russia or by a conference of the ambassadors of the States not immediately concerned—Germany, Italy, England, and France—or by reccurse to The Hague Tribunal. The last proposals of England and Russia went so far as to stipulate that Austria should retain Belgrade (the Serbian capital) as a guarantee until the peaceful settlement of her controversy with Serbia, and Grey declared that he would support every proposal seriously offered by Germany for a peaceful settlement of the controversy. At the same time he made it very plain to the Russian and French Governments that no English interests would be involved in the Serbian question, and that therefore England would not violate her neutrality on account of Serbia.

Germany and Austria either rejected all proposals or refused an answer under all sorts of pretexts. The favorite tactics were to pretend that Bethmann had asserted that he had forwarded the proposals to Vienna, and had as yet received no answer. If you had moved so much as your little finger, presto! "your war" would again have slipped through your fingers. How hard it is to start a war when all the neighbors want peace!

In vain the diplomats of France and Italy asked, "What is Austria really after? Surely outstanding points of difference could be settled in a quarter of an hour." Well, Austria, as your vassal, was forced to begin war according to the terms of her agreement—war at any cost. Austria, as your vassal—every page of the diplomatic documents is proof of that. Your statesmen and diplomats disposed of the affairs of Austria as if she were their ward and they her guardians, and issued statements for Austria without so much as asking her. In the White Book, which was presented to the Reichstag as evidence of the diplomatic activity preceding the war, there is not a single document, telegram, letter, or report of a conversation that was exchanged between you or your Government and the Austrian Emperor or Government!

On July 28 followed the Austrian declaration of war against Serbia and the Austrian mobilization against Serbia as well as against Russia. Thereupon the Czar was forced to mobilize for the protection of his realm.

On with the dance! The rest you took into your own hands; on July 31 the declaration that a state of war was impending and hasty ultimata to Russia and to France, with 12 and 18 hours, respectively, allowed for answer; on August 1 the declaration of war against Russia and general mobilization; on August 2 invasion of Luxemburg and an ultimatum to Belgium; on August 3 declaration of war against France.

Not until August 6 did Austria come hobbling obediently after with her declaration of war against Russia.

Meanwhile, on August 4, England had declared war on Germany, simply and solely because Belgium's neutrality had been violated. On August 4, when the German troops were already in Belgium, the British ambassador, Goschen, inquired of your secretary of state, Von Jagow, whether it would not be possible to give up the idea of invading Belgium and to withdraw the troops. The answer was a negative one, and thereupon he demanded his passports.

THE AIM OF THE WAR.

So you set the world on fire for nothing, over differences which were not worth so much as the telegrams of the diplomats, not to mention the blood of a single human being. Never has a war been trumped up more unscrupulously, never were the efforts of neighboring nations for peace more insultingly scorned and trodden under foot. Never were nations lied to and deceived more despicably than Germany and Austria by you in order to kindle an artificial "war enthusiasm"—an enthusiasm, however, which consisted in the howling of a hundred jingoes, while a thousand sensible men had to swallow their rage in silence. Never was every approach to the truth, every crack and cranny through which it might seep more carefully dammed.

A war without reason, without an aim, simply a gigantic military pageant for your amusement, and for the "renown" of the Hohenzollern," an imperial world-war game. A war of militarism and for militarism, like a revolver that has gone mad, finding life monotonous in its desk drawer and now fires about the streets at random.

Year after year the German people have to go on murdering and letting themselves be murdered, starving and getting deeper and deeper into debt, without finding out what the aims of the war are, without so much as being allowed to discuss them.

Oh, of course, it would not do to tell them that the whole affair was but an imperial war game.

German professors who crawl on their bellies before you, but who before the world outside give themselves all the airs of a Bismarck, are devoting their painstaking efforts to inventing "a posteriori," the missing causes and aims of the war. As Mephisto says:

> Don't worry if ideas amount to nil,
> A word in timely order fills the bill.

So they say, for instance, that German civilization must be protected against Pan-Slavism. By war? No, idiots; German civilization protects itself by its own superiority. Did you ever meet men in Germany who were afraid of being Russianized? German geologists who explore the mineral wealth of Russia, German engineers who survey the mines, German bankers who finance them, German physicians who are called to the sick beds of princes, German machine works which build up Russian industry and agriculture, German mechanics who set up the machines and direct the Russian laborers as to their use, German merchants who display to the Russians German articles of comfort and utility and teach them their application, German teachers and nurses who teach German to Russian society children and in this way break the ground for German culture, German publishers, German theatrical managers, German actors, German musicians, German painters, who present the products of German art to the Russians—these are the men who have hitherto conquered Russia in the interests of German culture, and not vice versa. But what it took them decades to build you destroyed with one stroke of the pen. They all prospered in Russia. You drove them out of it. Who knows whether they ever will be permitted to return? Pan-Slavism never estranged a German from things German, but with your cannon you drove German spirit and manners from Russia. Is it not one of the most incomparable jests in the history of the nations that this war was necessary to Russianize the good old German name of the Russian capital and make Petrograd out of Petersburg?

Again, we hear that Russia's designs upon Constantinople were a cause of the war. In reality Russia counseled Serbia to the utmost submission, and exhibited not the slightest intention to attack anyone, not even Turkey. Likewise, on former occasions, at the peace negotiations following the Balkan wars, her actions manifested far greater inclination toward peace than Austria did. We could have waited with perfect equanimity to see whether Russia would show signs of warlike intentions against Turkey, and would put these into effect, and whether even then our interests should necessitate armed intervention. In the history of the last hundred years Russia has, as a matter of fact, tried several times to get possession of Constantinople, but France and England have always thwarted her without its costing the life of a single German soldier. What foolish and stupid diplomacy it would be to provoke a war against Russia, France, and England, and to enlist Turkey on our side for the sake of forestalling alleged Russian designs upon Constantinople! That is why those whose political interests were far more opposed than ours to Russia's Dardanelles policies were made Russia's comrades in arms. If Russia conquered Germany she would really begin to be a menace to Constantinople; if she were defeated in the war you trumped up, she would necessarily look upon Turkey as a welcome compensation for the loss of Poland.

We must defend and establish the freedom of the seas against English supremacy. How silly! If the "freedom of the seas" had been threatened, compelling us to have recourse to arms on that account, then we should have had to address an ultimatum on this subject to England, and to declare war upon her. It was you, on the contrary, who begged for English neutrality, and as late as August 4, 1914, Bethmann-Hollweg declared in his speech to the Reichstag:

> We have declared to the British Government that as long as England remains neutral our fleet will not attack the northern coast of France, and we shall respect the territorial integrity and independence of Belgium. This declaration I herewith repeat before the world, and I may add that as long as England agrees in good faith to remain neutral we are also prepared to forego undertaking any hostile operations against the French merchant marine.

Is that the way one speaks in demanding of England the freedom of the seas and in drawing the sword on that account? No; it is England herself, the classic example of freedom of trade, who hitherto steadfastly maintained the freedom of the seas and water lanes, and defended it vigorously for all the world and against all the world, the most recent occasion being against the United States in the question of the Panama Canal tolls shortly before the outbreak of the war. Never has England threatened the development of our marine or our world commerce by a single word, much less by a deed. If, in the course of the war, England resorts to a blockade in order to starve out our country, an entirely legitimate proceeding in time of war, then the attempt to improve this condition for which you only are entirely to blame can not be represented as "the aim of the war." You might just as well call the dropping of bread cards or the elimination of press censorship our war aim. If I shot at a couple of passers-by from my window, and a third, in endeavoring to aid them, threw a stone at me and broke my window, I certainly could not maintain that I fired the shot in order to defend the freedom of my window.

Why waste so much as a single breath in discussing hollow phrases, such as our "place in the sun"? Who of you has found his "place in the sun" contested by the French, Russians, English, or Serbs? Not one, either in Germany or in the German colonies. Our colonies in Africa alone cover an area more than five times as large as the whole of the German Empire. In 1913 the total German population of all our African colonies amounted to about 27,000 (men, women, and children) less than in the average suburb of Berlin. How many million Germans might still find a "place in the sun" there? We had no use at all for so much territory, and had to spend many millions every year for its upkeep.

There is a tragic logic and justice in history. If you go to war to uphold unreal contentions, you risk having them come true negatively. Pan-Slavism did not threaten Germanism, but by the war the progress and success of Germanism in the east was brought to naught. Before the war Russia was not a source of danger to Constantinople; through the war it has become one. All the seas were open to us before the war; through it we have been barred from them. We had more room under the sun than we needed; now we stand shorn of our gains, and our colonies are in the possession of the entente.

Victory in war implies the attainment of a political end by means of military force. For example, Serbia in the first Balkan War. In war for war's sake there are only victories for victory's sake—the pseudovictories of militarism.

By the battle of the Marne the French stopped your advance toward Paris and forced your army back more than 100 kilometers (62 miles). That was a real victory for the French, for thus they destroyed your military project against Paris, and that was their first purpose in the war.

On the contrary, our occupation of northern France—which was made possible only by the forcible entrance into Belgium in violation of international law—is not a victory, for we do not in the least want northern France. Your Government does not want it, and not a single German soldier wishes to settle there. The only thing they all want is to come out again. And because you are too much ashamed and too cowardly to admit the truth, thousands upon thousands must continue to bleed to death from Verdun to Dixmude and by the Somme and the Yser.

Those are your victories, Imperator!

And what of our victories in Poland?

(I here pass over the fact that the latter were not won at once, as prescribed in the plan of campaign, but only after a year's time, and likewise not by the Austrians, but by the Germans.)

If what you desired was Poland's liberation from the Russian yoke, Poland's independence, consider how often we could have attained it during the past century at the time of various great Polish rebellions, if we had sent to their aid two or three Prussian army corps. But Bismarck very properly did nothing of the sort. The blood of German soldiers is too precious to be spent for the liberation of Poland; the enmity of Russia is too high a price for us to pay for her independence. But tell me, what Pole ever asked you to free him from Russia? What German ever declared himself ready to shed his blood for that cause?

If what you wished was the incorporation of Poland into Germany, drop it. We already have more than too many Poles in Prussia. We have already thrown away hundreds of millions of money in resisting Polish nationalization by our "colonization policy." We already have enough "Polish questions" in Prussia and in the Empire.

If, on the other hand, there was a plan to unite Poland with Austria, consider that Teutonism in Austria is even to-day engaged in a death grapple with the Slavs and Poles. The incorporation of Poland would mean the political ruin of the Germans in Austria and their suppression by the Czechs and Poles.

Is it for such "victories" that the blood of our young men and the billions of our national wealth must be sacrificed.

Take our victories in the Balkans. Whether Serbs or Bulgars, Roumanians or Greeks or Turks have a rag or tatter of land more or less down there is a matter of absolute indifference to Germany. In so far as we have interests in the Balkans we must protect them by commercial treaties; everything else is hellish madness. The whole of the Balkans are not worth the bones of a Prussian grenadier. This famous saying of Bismarck is just as true to-day as it was 40 years ago.

Anyone is a murderer and a traitor who sacrifices a single German in the cause of Bulgaria or Turkey.

THE WAR PLAN WRECKED.

In August, 1914, your war plan in the east was shattered. Instead of Warsaw being captured by the Austrians, Lemberg was taken and Przmysl besieged by the Russians. In east Prussia Gen. von Prittwitz und Gaffron, whom you had intrusted with the duty of guarding the border, got completely out of his rôle. This junker had already distinguished himself for his incapacity in the Silesian war games against von Strantz. The simultaneous attack of two great Russian armies—the Niemen and the Narew army—had not been anticipated in his program. Posen and Silesia lay open to a Russian invasion after the retreat and rout of the armies of Dankl and Auffenberg. Only the genius of two real generals, who, however, had not been provided for in your war plan—Hindenberg and Mackensen—and the unparalleled devotion of our Landwehr and Landsturm troops saved Germany from a catastrophe in the east, a catastrophe for which you would have been alone to blame.

In the west, after many bloody battles, entire failures from a strategic point of view, the Crown Prince of Bavaria succeeded in completely upsetting the local war plan in the great Battle of Lorraine August 18–21, 1914. The trenches, battery positions, and observation towers which your general staff had prepared so prematurely were left unused. It was all up with the idea of encircling and cutting off the French field force from its base. After we had foolishly given up the Vosges positions (for instance, at Donon), which we took at great cost at the beginning of the war, we finally won them back with great sacrifice of blood. That, of course, did not prevent you from triumphantly parading the battle in Lorraine before your people as a victory. Men in the inner circle assert that you yourself commanded the Bavarian Crown Prince to break off his strategic retreat prematurely, in spite of the urgent requests of Count Haessler. If this is correct—you know best yourself if it is—you are personally responsible for this failure also.

The attack upon Verdun, with the eventual surrounding and siege of the fortress, was the strategic task which you intrusted to your young hopeful, your first born. To-day, 30 months later, he finds himself on the same spot as on the 1st of September, 1914, but the graves of hundreds of thousands of German youths and men mark the theater of his activities as a general.

Large numbers of the Saxons were either captured or slain at Chalons, after failing to join forces at the beginning of September with the advancing armies of Bülow and Kluck. The force of the latter, which was already at the gates of Paris, was thereby threatened on the left wing with the danger of being surrounded by the French Army under Maunoury, and in the rear by the danger of being cut off and covered by an English Army which had landed at Boulogne. Only by a most rapid retreat from the Marne to the Aisne did they save themselves in the middle of September from a Sedan. Thus have your imperial maneuvers, senseless enough from a political standpoint, broken down and failed in every detail since the middle of September, 1914.

Since that time Germany has been a besieged fortress. Since then you have thrown sand in the eyes of the German people in civil and in military matters. Since then, to divert attention, victories have been wrung from weak States such as Serbia, Montenegro, and Roumania, and celebrated with monstrous exaggeration. Since then Germans have been slaughtered in order to protect the Hungarians, Turks, and Bulgars, whom you swept into the vortex of war, from the attacks which you have drawn down upon them. Since then myriads upon myriads of our brothers have poured out their life blood along the Yser, in the Champagne, at Arras, around Verdun, and on the Somme, not for any purpose or aim, but helpless victims of infamy. Every silent form—whether slain by us or by our "enemies"—is a murder at your hands, accusingly crying to Heaven for revenge!

The collapse of your war plan and the inner incoherence and hopelessness of the conflict are, of course, well known to our enemies. It is a secret only from the trustful, confiding German people. In truly tyrannical fashion you try to hide your weakness under a policy of frightfulness at home and abroad which is not only useless strategically but even detrimental, because it spurs the enemy to most savage resistance and evokes measures of reprisal. You plunder occupied territory, inhumanly exact fines on the merest pretexts, drag the inhabitants into slavery, throw bombs upon unprotected cities outside of the war zone, destroy monuments of art and civilization without sufficient reason, sink merchant and passenger ships of belligerent and even of neutral powers, in violation of international law, employ illegal means of warfare (gas attacks); at home you maintain secret spies, you infringe the inviolability of the mails, of the right to move freely from place to place, and of other civil rights; you arbitrarily imprison without legal justification, and unconstitutionally suppress accurately reported speeches in the Reichstag; you are shockingly unreasonable and treacherous in dealing with business, and crown all your misdeeds by the shooting of starving women and children with machine guns. By these and many other acts you have not only graven your mark deep into the brazen tablets of the world's history as the most infamous monster of all mankind, but, what is more to be regretted, you have sullied for all time the honor of Germany, to the rage and shame of all noble and right-thinking German men and women. Through your agents you vainly attempt to bribe public opinion in foreign countries with gold—with the gold of your people. Every thinking neutral, every reasonable person is upon the side of our enemies, not because he has been bribed, nor because he is a manufacturer of munitions, but out of sheer enthusiasm for the great common cause of humanity, the cause which you tread underfoot. Millions flow ceaselessly from their pockets for the amelioration of distress among your most unhappy victims—the Belgians, the Poles, and the Serbs.

THE GUILT.

He who fights for his rights may be defeated with honor. He who fights an unjust cause must win or go under.

As we well know, the voice of conscience speaks ever more insistently to your heart. The furies whiten your hair, and under their pursuit your features grow wild and haggard. There was no pose in your words when you said, as you knelt upon a great common grave of German soldiers in Flanders: "This was not what I wanted." It was the cry of a stupid boy who throws a match into a powder keg on seeing the destruction which he has caused. "The war was not what I wanted." This was the sort of lie your sycophants tried to make out of your words.

But you are too much of a coward to make amends for your guilt—the heaviest blood guilt which a man has ever taken upon himself. With averted eyes you whine out your prayers to the God whom you ask to protect you from the consequence of your iniquity, and while you go on heaping murder on murder through your accomplices you charge others with the guilt which you have brought upon yourself. We already have condemned and despised you—now you make us sick with disgust. "Semper calumnaire audacter." "Always tell lies boldly." That is the only way in which you and your Government show their courage.

For decades France has committed no hostile act toward Germany. She elected no more "revenge howlers" to her ministries, nor to other places of responsibility, and she showed her love of peace in the three Morocco crises. After Austria's declaration of war against Serbia, when the German boundary was already occupied by military outposts and Germany's purposes were well known, France directed her soldiers to keep 10 kilometers (6 miles) within our own territory, in order to avoid any possible conflict with you, and to give you not the least pretext for a declaration of war. Even with your Government's most barefaced lies concerning the alleged presence of French airmen along the Rhine and over Nuremberg, statements which have since been denied by the magistrate of Nuremberg himself, it could not fool the world into believing that France shared any guilt for the war.

Again, it is claimed that Russia by her mobilization interrupted the negotiations for settling the Austro-Serbian dispute, which are alleged to have been under way, and for this reason she is charged with having forced you to declare war. According to Bethmann-Hollweg in his speech before the Reichstag August 4, 1914, the mobilization on our boundary was already in full swing in the night of July 30–31, 1914. As a matter of fact the Russian mobilization of the four southern Provinces of Kiev, Kasan, Odessa, and Moscow was ordered on July 29 and officially reported to the powers. The general mobilization took place at 1 in the morning on July 31. But note that:

(1) Mobilization is not war; mobilization is increased military preparedness. Austria was mobilized for a long time after the first Balkan War without Russia or any other power deriving a reason for war from that fact. The Czar and his minister of foreign affairs, Sasonoff, gave the most solemn assurances that Russia's mobilization was without aggressive intent of any sort, that Russia would not begin hostilities under any circumstances. They not only declared themselves ready to continue negotiations, but for their own part made the most extensive proposals for a peaceful settlement of the Serbian question. (Belgrade pledged for the fulfillment of Austria's desires.) The Czar left it within your discretion to answer the Russian mobilization with a German mobilization.

(2) Austria had mobilized on July 28 against Russia, too. The Russian mobilization was therefore evoked by Austria's and as necessary to self-defense. Moreover, Russia was fully acquainted with your intentions in regard to the war. From the very conduct of the Austrian and German Governments in the Serbian question their intention to make war became perfectly evident. It would have been most conscienceless and remiss in the Czar and his Government had they left their country an unprotected prey to the Austro-German attack.

(3) At the hour of the Russian mobilization you had not yet, to be sure, given the official order for mobilization. In reality, however, so many military preparations had already been made that they amounted to a mobilization. We mention only a few, such as were, for the most part, known to us personally. After July 25 the boundaries, stations, railroad tunnels, and bridges were put under military guard. After July 26, if not earlier, aeroplanes and Zeppelins patroled the boundaries and the islands of the North Sea, and likewise torpedo boats in the North Sea and the Baltic. After July 27 cavalry sabers were sharpened. After July 29 innumerable military transport trains passed over the German railroads; for instance, in the night of July 29–30 alone 35 military trains went through Nuremberg. On July 29 several regiments of heavy artillery landed in Borkum, filled the whole island with heavy cannon, destroyed the quays, beach pavilions, and so forth, and mined the hotels and houses along the shore in order that they might be blown up at any moment. On July 30 the entire population was forced to leave the island with the exception of the men between the ages of 17 and 60, who were compelled to remain. On July 30 telegraph and telephone communication with territory along the boundaries and within such territory was stopped or placed under military control. At least as early as July 30 large numbers of reserve officers and landwehr officers and also reservists had in their hands calls to the colors either by telegraph or by letter. All these measures were taken not ony against Russia but even against England and France, although a war of aggression by Russia would in no way have involved France under the terms of her alliance. Your offensive war against Russia had therefore been resolved upon and settled since the ultimatum to Serbia (in reality for many a year before that).

No; Russia's mobilization was not a cause for war. It was, however, very annoying to you, because you now had to make your attack not against a defenseless enemy but against one who was armed. You behaved like the robber who calls out to his victim when the latter reaches for his revolver, "Drop your gun or I'll shoot!" That was what your ultimatum to Russia amounted to.

In truth, ever since we were comrades in arms with Russia in the war of liberation against Napoleon we have been united with her in friendship for more than a hundred years. That friendship was fostered by Bismarck and all far-sighted German statesmen. It was gratefully acknowledged and returned by the Russians, especially by Czar Nicholas, and the high esteem in which it was held continued until the last instant before your declaration of war. This friendship you senselessly tore to shreds, and in so doing you tore all commercial and intellectual bonds which up to that moment had joined the people of Germany and Russia, with so much profit to us.

But, worst of all, the German people, inexperienced as they are politically, are being scandalously deceived with lies about the English "encircling" policy, which is alleged to be responsible for the war.

Envy of Germany's political success, of her colonies, her merchant marine, her commerce, and her industry is given as the motive for this policy.

If only the German people were not so blinded by their own self-satisfaction, and had a little knowledge of foreign affairs, they would know that England is much nearer contemplating our development with a condescending smile than with envy.

It is with envy that thinking men in Germany look upon the superiority of English statecraft in domestic and foreign policies, and upon the splendid results of these policies, which have made the English tongue and English civilization supreme over whole continents almost without a stroke of the sword.

They see with envy that German emigrants make their way to English colonies prospering under a model government, whereas in our colonies they find only the bureaucracy and caste of the mother country. Our emigrants prefer other spots to a place under the sun of your colonial government, and, sad to say, for entirely justifiable reasons.

They see with envy that peoples subjugated by England—as, for instance, the Boers—grow and prosper under English freedom, justice, and statecraft, and after but a few years become the most enthusiastic partisans of the English Government, while strangers whom we have incorporated within Germany—the Alsatians, the people of Lorraine, the Poles, and the Danes—under the yoke of your military and junker rule remain at all times a thorn in our flesh.

House rents, most articles of food, and taxes were far lower in England before the war than in Germany. Incomes under 3,000 marks ($750) were free from an income tax. In 1913, only 5.18 per cent (approximately a twentieth) of all householders in Prussia had an income of over 3,000 marks; on the other hand, more than half—50.5 per cent—had an income under 900 marks ($225). In other words, more than half of your subjects were living in the most poverty-stricken circumstances.

While in England, even in the large cities, almost every skilled workman and his family have their own house and garden, in Berlin, according to the census of 1905, 820,071 people were living in one-room dwellings; 49,991 of such single rooms were inhabited by 5 or more people—up to 13. Countless Germans have smaller living quarters at their disposal than the inmate of a prison cell.

In spite of its brilliant development, our foreign trade in comparison with our population is not only smaller than England's, but also than that of Holland, Denmark, and Switzerland—and, at that, Switzerland does not possess a single ship. Likewise, our public well-being is comparatively far below that of these small States and of England. Neither the size of a State nor its military power in any way promotes the happiness and welfare of the population. These conditions depend solely upon science, mechanical development, art, commerce, and business activity. By militarism the achievements of civilization can be only destroyed, never brought forth. Even in times of peace militarism continually withdraws from economic pursuits hundreds of thousands of men in their prime and billions of capital, and necessitates financial legislation which, at every turn and corner, makes the business of earning a living more difficult and costly, hinders and obstructs trade and economic progress, and, finally, handicaps industry in its ability to compete with foreign countries.

The English know all this. You may be sure they do not envy us. The free Briton, who finds strength and discipline in his chosen "sport," looks down with scorn, not envy, upon your people in the leading strings of militarism, bureaucracy, junkerism, and clericalism. He sees them governed and impoverished by a few dozen superfluous princes—before the war just as much as now.

The people of England, entirely antimilitary though they are, whom you and the wiseacres of your general staff treated as nobodies from a military point of view and sport for the cartoonist, predicted a war of three years' duration from the very beginning, even at the time when Count Haiseler said he expected to celebrate Sedan Day, 1914, in Paris, and when you were prophesying that the Landsturm would come home in the fall of the year.

If England, with her enormous colonial empire spanning as it does half the globe, had ever pursued a policy of selfishness against Germany or had ever wished to do so, she would have found nothing easier. She could have introduced protective tariffs in order to insure her industry against German competition. She could have granted her ships in her colonial harbors and marine coaling stations as well as in England special privileges, for instance, better docking facilities and cheaper harbor tolls. She could have made German trade in England and in the British colonies difficult and expensive by requiring passports and trade licenses involving payments, etc. She could have pushed Germans from her doorstep as "troublesome foreigners" in the same way you treat foreigners in Prussia. But, no. In no foreign country, not in the German Empire itself, have Germans possessed so much freedom as in England and in England's colonies. Nowhere in Germany have foreigners possessed so much freedom as Germans in England have. England has never pursued a policy of envy against Germany. To wage war because of envy—such an absurdity can only find lodgment in a brain completely inoculated with militarism.

It is a profoundly significant dispensation in world history that the most peaceful Government in the world, the first to inscribe the ideas of pacifism upon her banners and to resolve, with typical British energy, upon translation of these ideas into deeds, has been compelled for this very reason to wage in the interests of humanity the greatest war which England has ever conducted, a war to exterminate wars, at least among civilized nations.

Even as far back as 1890, during a discussion of the Caprivi Zanzibar treaty, in the British Lower House, by which Helgoland was relinquished to Germany, one of the members expressed his fear that Germany might be able to make a fortress out of this island for use against England. Lord Salisbury, the prime minister, remarked that this possibility was not worth considering, as another war among the enlightened nations of Europe was certainly not likely to occur.

That thought was typical of English statesmen who judge others by the same standards of good sense as they apply to themselves. But your uncle, then Prince of Wales and later King Edward VII, knew you better. He had had far too many opportunities to observe you from your youth up and to become acquainted with your purely militaristic range of ideas for him not to recognize what a monstrous danger threatened the peace of the world from this source. This far-seeing man of the world, friend of the arts and sciences, fond of life's pleasures, who was as seldom seen in uniform as you were seen without it, made it his business to travel about among our neighbors, including Austria, because he knew of the impending danger. Solely to imprison your overeager sword within its sheath and to keep the peace of Europe, he assured them: "If Germany should make a sudden attack upon you, call on me!" He did not bind himself but he threatened you: if you break the peace, you will find England on the side of your opponents!

This is the starting point, the purport, and aim of the entire "encirclement" policy. It would have preserved peace to our own advantage—permanently, too—if you had taken England's power and England's word as seriously as they have always deserved to be taken. But in your infatuation you were mad enough to believe that you could unhinge England's world power with the help of the Sultan.

The three shining lights of England's political heaven—Asquith, Grey, and Lloyd-George. They are not only the most important statesmen on earth to-day but also the greatest pacifists who have ever directed a Government. Up to the outbreak of the war their reasoning was as follows: The annual European expenditures for armaments devour billions altogether fruitlessly, to the detriment of all the nations concerned, and of civilization. The latter could be splendidly promoted with a fraction of the sums thus squandered. These expenditures are entirely futile, for every increase in the armament of one country is followed by an increase among her competitors, the ratio therefore always remaining the same; and they do not serve to insure peace but to increase the danger of war, and the longer this is kept up the worse the danger. Just as individual peoples, by means of an organized State administration of law to which they were subject, succeeded in emerging from the medieval epoch of the robber knight when one vassal constantly warred against another, so the enlightened States of to-day must leave behind the whole war system and attain an orderly régime based upon international law and treaties, under which disputes as they arise will be settled by arbitration having universal sanction and conducted by disinterested powers (the Hague Tribunal).

These men, moreover, have always acted in accordance with these principles. Thus they came to mutual agreements with Russia in determining their sphere of influence in Persia, with Japan in the matter of their respective policies in eastern Asia, and, shortly before the outbreak of the world war, with Germany in determining her sphere of interest in Mesopotamia. In this way friction over critical points is out of the question from the very first.

At the instance of Sir Edward Grey in 1906 the question of armament was placed upon the program of the second Hague Peace Conference. Grey explained this in the lower house in the following words:

"At no time has public opinion in Europe been more firmly fixed upon peace than at the present, and yet the burden of appropriations for the army and navy is constantly increasing. The Hague conference could render no more meritorious service than to make the terms upon which peace is maintained less expensive than heretofore. It has been said we should wait for other powers, but as matters now stand all the powers are waiting for one another, and some day one of them must take the first step."

This first step was taken by Sir Edward Grey.

In harmony with its obstructionist policy at the first Hague conference, your Government, with the support of Austria at the second conference, categorically opposed all progress in the direction suggested by Sir Edward Grey, and, in fact, all advance toward world peace in general. On the ground that those were their instructions, your representatives not only declined all discussion of this question for their own part, but even registered a formal protest against debates on this subject by the representatives of other States. Thus most of the States, including England, France, and Russia, had proposed and resolved that the powers should bind themselves to appeal to the Hague court of arbitration at least in all questions which did not involve the vital interests or the independence of the contesting parties. Germany and Austria not only refused this proposal, but also protested against this resolution being considered as binding even upon the States which had agreed to it—i. e., not upon Germany and Austria.

The two Hague peace conferences could therefore make resolutions applicable only in case of a war, but could not frame resolutions to prevent a war, though this had been the earnest desire of all the other civilized powers, England especially.

After the failure of these plans for peace and disarmament, the English statesmen, led by Sir Edward Grey, sought year in and year out to come to an agreement with Germany in order at least to set a limit to naval armaments. Sensible merchants—which the English are, while your professional soldiers and diplomats certainly are not—would scarcely keep 100 fire and theft proof safes if 1 answered the purpose. Grey kept indefatigably making proposals, for instance, that the present status of the fleets of England and Germany, 16 to 10, should be maintained, with the threat, however, that for every new German warship England would lay down two—two keels for one. In other words, if you were willing to refrain from further naval preparations, England would do the same, the ratio remaining 16 to 10. If, however, you refuse, your sea power will constantly grow less in relation to England's.

As a representative of the Krupp firm, of course you could not agree to this proposal.

After the failure of the Hague peace conference in 1907, the tireless English summoned a world peace congress in London during the summer of 1908. At this Lloyd-George, then minister of finance, pleaded in an impassioned speech for an understanding between Germany and England and declared it a pity "that in the twentieth century it should be necessary to hold a conference in a civilized country to protest against Christian States annually expending about $2,000,000,000 for the purpose of preparing to kill one another."

Asquith declared that "England would joyfully grasp the hand which was offered her in good faith and with a friendly purpose."

England kept on offering you her hand. You always refused to take it, and replied by new navy and army bills.

In a speech in the lower House December 12, 1910, Grey called the continued increase in military preparations a "breaking down of civilization" and a "bleeding to death in times of peace." Grey continually and expressly offered Germany the friendship of England and assured her that "the friendly relations which England had already formed were no obstacle to her making new ones." A single word from you and Germany would have been received into the entente as a highly esteemed and welcome member of the community which stood for enlightenment and peace in Europe.

Since the English Government realized that you were steering more and more steadily toward war it sent Lord Haldane, with whom you had for a long time been on terms of personal friendship, on a special mission to Berlin in February, 1912, in order to influence you toward peace. He was forced to the disappointing conclusion that all his efforts were in vain. While he was negotiating with you for peace, you were treating with him for England's neutrality in case of war. You wanted to make it easier for yourself to carry on war by eliminating England, while England, on the other hand, wished to make it harder for you to carry on war at all.

Grey declined to accede to your demand for neutrality, and on account of his obligations to Belgium he could not have done otherwise if he had wished. At the same time, however, in a document handed to the German ambassador, he made the following official declaration on the basis of a resolution of the cabinet: "England will neither make an unprovoked attack upon Germany nor will she take part in such an attack. An attack upon Germany is not the object nor a constituent part of any treaty, understanding, or alliance to which England is a party. England will never allow herself to be involved in any such agreement."

Can a power more strongly emphasize its peaceable purposes or more safely guarantee them for the future? It must be remembered that England was under no obligation whatsoever to make any such binding declarations, and that it was a pure and unrequited proof of her peaceful and friendly designs toward Germany.

England has not encircled Germany, but, in spite of the offers made by England, Germany and Austria have purposely and with malevolent and hostile intent kept aloof from all peaceable, friendly agreements which the other great powers of Europe have made with one another in order to preserve world peace.

Sir Edward Grey displayed feverish activity in the critical days from July 23 to August 1, 1914. Even the energy with which he labored day and night over countless dispatches and conferences in the interests of a peaceful understanding was astonishing. All the published diplomatic documents, even the much-doctored ones of the German White Book, present an unmistakable record of his activity. He exerted powerful pressure upon Servia, Russia, and France in favor of unlimited compliance and with complete success. Only in the case of Germany and Austria did all his proposals, suggestions, and inquiries fall upon deaf ears. They both discarded—the German Government would submit the proposal to Austria; the Austrian Government made no reply. As in 1912, so now the German Government answered England's peace proposals with the demand that England remain neutral. This was equivalent to an acknowledgment that she wished to carry on war but without England's intervention.

Grey issued the following statement on July 31, 1914, through the British ambassador in Berlin: "England declines the proposal concerning neutrality. Friendly relations between England and Germany can be maintained in only one way; that is, if these two countries unite in a common effort to preserve the peace of Europe. If they make this effort, the relations between these countries will automatically be improved and reinforced. The British Government is prepared to exert itself in this direction with all seriousness and good will. If the peace of Europe can be preserved at this time and the crisis safely passed, England's whole efforts will be directed toward bringing about an arrangement to which Germany could be a party, and in which it would find an absolute assurance that no aggressive or hostile policies of any sort would be pursued against it or its allies by France, Russia, or England. This had been his wish, and he had labored for this end to the full extent of his ability. His idea had hitherto appeared too Utopian to be the definite objective of actual proposals. If, however, the present crisis, which was more dangerous than any which had arisen in Europe for generations, should be safely passed, he hoped that the period of relief and relaxation of tension following it would bring the powers into closer touch with each other than had hitherto been possible."

Bethmann-Hollweg had a copy made of this truly touching appeal from Grey "in order to be able to consider the matter at his leisure," as he said to the British ambassador. Manifestly the result of this consideration was the declaration on the same day that the country was in imminent peril of war, and the ultimata to Russia and France.

Many other proofs of England's desire for peace and positive efforts toward peace could be adduced. Just as you prepared for war so England prepared for peace. In the last years before the war she called one international congress in London after another. After the congress for world peace in London, 1908, which we have already mentioned, there followed congresses of authors, bankers, leaders of Parliament, doctors, physicians, and naturalists, all with the purpose of influencing public opinion in Germany in favor of a peaceful rapprochement between the powers. Love's labor lost, for in Germany public opinion does not decide questions of war and peace as it does in England, but, according to the constitution of the Empire, these matters rest solely with the Emperor.

And for this reason also you alone bear the responsibility! You and the counsellors you yourself chose!

Lest any misunderstanding arise it should be emphasized as self-evident that your responsibility is not removed or diminished by the Reichstag's granting of war credits. You did not consult the Reichstag before the ultimata to Serbia, Russia, France, and Belgium, nor before the declarations of war. It was not until after these, on the 4th of August, 1914, that the Reichstag was consulted, and even then you did not tell it the truth; you lied about the antecedents, the causes, and the aims of the war. The Reichstag of August 4, 1914, found itself, figuratively speaking, in the position of a fire company, which has to get out the fire-fighting apparatus even if the owner or head of the house himself has started the blaze. This is not the place to discuss such questions as, for instance, whether the Reichstag could not have acted to better purpose, with more energy, insight, and appreciation of the demands of the situation, and whether individual members of it were not already acquainted with your intentions and were your accessories and partners in crime. No wholesale murderer is absolved from blame because he had accomplices or because the consequences of his deed could have been obviated by the prudent interference of others.

The indictment of you which we made at the beginning of this writing is therefore proved in every particular.

CONCLUSION.

No web of lies, no matter how intricate, can absolve you from guilt before the world, nor can it cloud the vision of neutral or even hostile nations.

And though you and your henchmen have hitherto succeeded by brute force and with Jesuit wiles in barring the door to truth in Germany, some day the truth will yet come in. And the longer that day is in coming the worse not only for Germany but for you, too, your house, and all your crew!

You and your Government are the ones who not only began the war, but you alone prevent the bloodshed from coming to an end. Nothing else whatever stands in the way of Germany's still making an honorable peace.

Your downfall, the downfall of the monarchic-militaristic-junker Government in Germany and the establishment of a German Republic, marching hand in hand with England and France—this would mean peace, prosperity, and happiness for the whole world; a deep sigh of relief after a universal régime of blood and madness—relief for the whole world, but above all for Germany itself.

When some one asked Bismarck after the battle of Koniggratz what he would have done had the battle turned out unfavorably, he answered: "I should have put myself at the head of a cavalry charge and ridden into the thick of the fight, and never come back alive." Thus spoke a great man, a man of power, but a man—one who knew how to bear the consequences of his deeds, not a scoundrel who snivels sanctimoniously as day after day he heaps corpse upon corpse merely because he is too craven to confess his guilt before God and man and to pay the price with his life.

Woe to you; woe to your brood and to your aids and abettors!

Truth is on the way; the hand of eternal justice even now writes in characters of fire on the walls of your palace:

MENE TEKEL UPHARSIN!

You have plunged humanity into the bloodiest, most senseless, and most frenzied of all wars, and insulted humanity can not and will not rest until the evil which imperils peace, progress, and happiness of mankind is rooted out and destroyed. Other nations, to be sure, but above all the German people themselves, must insist inexorably that the system you and your hangers-on represent, the régime of militarism, endless armaments, and constant sword rattling, shall disappear from the earth. Not regis voluntas suprema lex, but legis voluntas supremus rex—not "Might makes right," but "Right makes might"—is to be the watchword of the world in the future. Only the people themselves shall decide matters affecting their own weal and woe and war and peace, not the moods of tyrants thirsting for power. Then we can go about our peaceful business unconcerned; the nations will no longer butcher each other in order to have victories to celebrate.

If the German people do not wish permanently to become your partners in guilt—if they desire to have a voice in the future reorganization of Europe and above all in the reorganization of Germany—they have got to wake up before it is too late and make common cause with the enlightened powers of the world and draw their sword against him who is truly their only enemy, who is to blame for the misfortunes of humanity and the outrageous disgrace of Germany. If the German people, from stupidity or cowardice, can not arouse themselves to this work of liberation, if they leave it to our "enemies" alone, they will forever have forfeited the right to be heard in the council of the nations and to play a part in world history.

Comrades and brothers of Germany, your "enemies" have neither the wish nor the power to destroy Germany, as your Government would deceive you into believing. But you yourselves destroy Germany, you die of wounds and hunger, and you tread Germany's honor and prestige in the dust so long as you bow your heads to the slavery of the Kaiser.

Wake up and act, but make haste, before it is too late!

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 18, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 17, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Almighty God our Heavenly Father, that in spite of the terrible war through which the world is passing, with its widespread desolation, unspeakable horrors, instituted by the brutal methods employed by its projectors, there is more good in the world than evil, as witnessed by the thousands of brave men who have laid down their lives, and the millions who are ready to follow their example, in defense of the God-given rights of men; the holy sacrifices made by the people of all that they hold dear; the Red Cross, which is carrying aid, succor, and comfort to the wounded and dying, desolate homes, widows and orphans.

In a world-wide protest against the brutal methods employed by the enemies of civilization, in their insane desire to subjugate mankind to their fiendish desires, grant, O most merciful Father, that they may be driven back and taught a lesson which they will never forget, and Thy will be done in the spirit of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PROHIBITION AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has here a communication signed by the governor of Virginia and the secretary of the state announcing the ratification of the prohibition amendment, which will be filed among the archives of the House. [Applause.]

LATE MAJ. AUGUSTUS P. GARDNER.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for seven minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for seven minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, at 2 o'clock this afternoon at St. Johns Church, in the city of Washington, and prior to his burial at Arlington, will be held the funeral services of a man who was the well-beloved friend of practically every Member of this House.

Had it been left to Congress to make decision, this ceremony would have been solemnized in the Capitol of the United States and would have been of proportions in a greater degree commensurate with our conception of the magnitude of the services he rendered to the Nation. We have yielded only to the expressed desire of his family for a ceremony more significant of the admirable simplicty of his character, which we his colleagues and companions have understood perhaps better than any other men.

To each one of us, and man after man during the past two days has said it in my hearing, the death of Maj. Augustus Peabody Gardner assumes the proportions of a grave individual loss. To myself, and I hope I may be pardoned the personal touch, it is comparable only to that of a member of my immediate family. For years he and I have been the closest sort of friends and our friendship grew as the years advanced.

It so happened that many important events in our lives were curiously similar. Though he was a few years older than I, we were born upon the same day, and for the last 25 years at least not a 5th of November passed without our exchanging birthday felicitations by telegraph or cable. On the same day we were each elected to our first public office of importance, he to the Massachusetts Senate, I to the Ohio House of Representatives. Four years later on the 5th of November, 1902, we were both elected to Congress. From then on no two men here, I think, were in more intimate, almost daily, association. We used to discuss most fully and frankly the details, from every angle, of conditions existing in our respective districts and our methods of meeting them. As a rule our discussions ended in substantial agreement, not infrequently, however, they resulted in the tacit understanding that if I could not be elected a county sheriff in his district he could not be elected a ward constable in mine.

As events proved, he was right more often than I because his service was continuous while mine, as you know, was interrupted.

He was a sturdy friend, a wonderful companion, and I shall miss him sadly.

To the country Gardner's taking off, particularly at this time, is a loss of monumental proportions, if not one entirely irreparable. Putting aside all question of his proved usefulness in many legislative fields, he had in the last few years so made himself the very cornerstone in Congress of the structure of national military preparedness that we shall search in vain, I fear, for one to fill his place. Where shall we find another with a knowledge of military technique so complete, an energy so vast, a purpose to force home the truth so indomitable?

His voice was the first raised in Congress for preparedness without reserve and without equivocation. Unfortunately, for many months it was as a "vox clamantis in deserto" and fell unheeded upon the ears of men in high places. Where now, though, is the man who will deny that had greater heed been paid to his warnings and action founded upon them this country would be playing a far more active and effective part in the war, that our ultimate cost in blood and treasure would have been infinitely less and the day of victory far advanced?

Whether or not Gardner became discouraged at the failure of his preachments to be translated into action, the fact is that more than a year ago he decided that his best sphere of usefulness lay in active military service. He reached this conclusion against the advice of many of his friends, and I was one of them who believed that he ought to stay in Congress, not only because of his unique knowledge of military and naval subjects and the service he had rendered, and would be able in even greater degree to render to the cause of preparedness, but because also of his physical condition, being aware that though an active and vigorous man his heart was not just what it ought to be. He would not listen to us, though, and a year ago last December he passed the examinations as a reserve officer of the Spanish War, which made him eligible for and subject to active duty. In May, soon after a state of war was declared, he received his summons, resigned his seat in Congress, and joined the colors with the rank of colonel.

Here, again, in a new field of activity Gardner proved a unique figure. He is the first military officer of the United States, so far as my knowledge goes, who was demoted in rank at his own request. His ambition was for active service at the front, not for rank. He wanted to get to France, and felt that his chances for this service were better as a major in the field than as a colonel on staff duty.

Death alone foiled his ambition, but it was a death which will be held, I am satisfied, in the mature judgment of his countrymen, to have been fully as glorious as if it had come upon the battle fields of France and under the guns of the enemy.

When the history of these times is written, when the services of men to the American Nation in this, its time of greatest need, and their contribution to the ultimate victory which we will, must, and shall win are duly weighed and appraised by posterity, I predict with perfect confidence that high upon the roll of honor will be written the name of Augustus Peabody Gardner, statesman, patriot, and gallant gentleman. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Young, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. J. Res. 174. Joint resolution for the purpose of promoting efficiency, for the utilization of the resources and industries of the United States, for lessening the expenses of the war, and restoring the loss caused by the war by providing for the employment of a discovery or invention called the "Garabed," claiming to make possible the utilization of free energy.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. FRANCE and Mr. HOLLIS members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

RECESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, in order to give the Members of the House an opportunity to attend the funeral services of the late Augustus P. Gardner, and as a further mark of respect to his memory, I ask unanimous consent that the House shall stand in recess from 1.45 p. m. to-day until 3 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess from 1.45 p. m. until 3 o'clock p. m. in order to enable the Members to attend the funeral of Maj. Gardner. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R.

8696, the Indian appropriation bill, and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see if we can come to an agreement as to the time necessary for general debate on this matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to be able to conclude the debate that is general—that is, debate outside the bill—to-day, but that will be impossible. I have requests for more than three hours, and they are coming in every few minutes. This is the second appropriation bill that has been considered, and many men have things which they desire to say. I suggest that the general debate run on to-day and we may be able to arrive at some conclusion in respect to it to-morrow.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In respect to the predicament the gentleman from Kansas finds himself in in reference to demand for general debate, I ask unanimous consent that general debate may continue to-day and for one hour to-morrow, after which the bill shall be taken up under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, one hour to-morrow will not be sufficient. We shall be away from the House for an hour and a quarter to-day.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I had understood from the gentleman from Kansas that that would be sufficient.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We recess during the afternoon from 1.45 until 3.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is correct, Mr. Speaker. The statement the gentleman made to me in person was prior to the time that either one of us knew that a recess would be had. I will amend that request, Mr. Speaker, to provide for general debate to-day and for two hours to-morrow, if that will meet the condition.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I sugest to the gentleman from Oklahoma that we have general debate to-day, and then see what the status of the debate is on to-morrow, and conclude it at as early an hour as possible then.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to cut off general debate if any of the Members should want to speak.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no desire to prolong it beyond what is absolutely necessary.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think we ought to have some specific time at which general debate will end. If that does not satisfy the gentleman I would be willing to add 30 minutes more to that time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think we can agree to-morrow morning on the amount of time to be consumed then.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Why could we not agree to-day and have that disposed of? If we agree to-day, then all the requests that have come in prior to now will be taken care of, and every man who has presented a request to the gentleman from Kansas will have his time; but if we leave the matter open, it will only perhaps bring more requests to both of us and make additional time necessary.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We might just as well get rid of as much general debate on this bill as possible. The Members will have their time, and if it is taken on this bill it will not be taken on the next bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to ask the chairman and the gentleman from Kansas about how long they think it will take after general debate to conclude the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. So far as I am concerned, I do not think it will take very long. There is nothing new in the bill, except that it has been pared pretty closely.

Mr. KITCHIN. Do you think we can conclude it easily before 5 o'clock Saturday?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think so.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We might, but I do not think we will get through with it without a couple of days under the five-minute rule, although we will push it as fast as we can. It usually takes two days to pass the bill, and sometimes three and four.

Mr. KITCHIN. We ought to get through with it by Saturday.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want to expedite the passage of the bill, and have——

Mr. KITCHIN. We hope to have Monday on the Agricultural bill, anyway.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think the reading of the bill will consume less time than has been usual with this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Could we not meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and then finish it in two or three hours of general debate?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That might be done.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will ask unanimous consent now to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MADDEN. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Which one? Two have risen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota got up first.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I hope he will not urge that request, for this reason, that the important committees and other committees of the House are all meeting every day now in the preparation of their respective bills, and a committee meeting that has to adjourn at 11 o'clock accomplishes nothing. Let us not have sessions of the House beginning at 11 o'clock in the morning until later in the session.

Mr. KITCHIN. I imagine that very few members of the other committees will desire to hear or participate in the general debate. This request is just to give more time for general debate. I am not asking now for time to be devoted to the discussion of the merits of the bill under the five-minute rule, but just to extend the time for general debate.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina what business there is on the calendar that is so pressing as to make it necessary to meet at 11 o'clock?

Mr. KITCHIN. We hope to have in the Agricultural appropriation bill on Monday.

Mr. GILLETT. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a number of gentlemen have spoken to me recently about asking unanimous consent to address the House, and I have suggested to all of them that they should wait until an appropriation bill came up, when they would have the right to address the House, and not have to ask it as a courtesy. A great many Members have thoughts seething in their brains that they would like to get rid of. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I think it is a good thing to afford opportunity for gentlemen to get rid of the thoughts that are seething in their brains on this bill and other bills, because when we get into the discussion of the Agricultural bill and those that are immediately to follow we will not have so much general debate, and the debate then will be confined more strictly to the bills. Therefore I hope the gentleman will not object to meeting at 11 o'clock to-morrow. We can agree upon any time to-day, I suggest to the chairman, and to-morrow, if we agree upon 11 o'clock, we can close general debate earlier than would be possible otherwise.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I will say that there will not be any effort on my part and that of other members of the committee on this side to curtail general debate at all. I realize the force of what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has said, that Members of the House have hitherto been very patient about taking up the time of the House with speeches. I am perfectly content that they shall have every moment they want on this bill for general debate. I am willing that they shall have every opportunity, but if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] insists I will be content to-morrow to make an agreement, but I do not think that should interfere with the House meeting at 11 o'clock.

Mr. GILLETT. I am willing that the House should meet at 11 o'clock for general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a good time to call attention to the fact that those in control of the House have not been doing anything up to now; have not been meeting at all. Every time we have a bill coming before the House they want us to meet at 11 o'clock and rush it through before 6 o'clock.

If those in control of the House business would get down to a systematic business method of running the House we would get through with the business of the House. Some of the committees of the House have already reported their bills, and after they have been passed we continue to come here day after day without anything to do. There is not any justification for that. If there is not going to be some systematic effort to go on with the business of the House regularly from now on, I shall object to the proposition of meeting at 11 o'clock and rushing through before 6 o'clock without a chance of fully considering the bills.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman object now? If the gentleman will, I will not say what I had in mind, because I am afraid that he will object afterwards. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to hear the gentleman say what is in his mind.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me say to the gentleman in all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, that the House and the committees have done more work and passed more legislation, and a larger number of appropriation bills are ready to report now, than at any regular session in 8 or 10 years. I happened to make a note of that.

Mr. MADDEN. We were already organized last spring.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We have been every year, except 1915; we were organized in the spring, and have been for 10 years, except in 1915.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to call the attention of the House and of the country to the inefficiency of the majority of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think the gentleman should come into the House just to make objections. He ought to stay here and see what we are doing.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman that I am on the floor of the House 10 hours to his 10 minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that I can not be on the floor all the time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. NOLAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what the gentleman from North Carolina is going to do about undoing the tangle on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. We can take it up later.

Mr. NOLAN. No; you will have to take it up now and do something to untangle it, or I will object. I do object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California objects.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. What is the tangle, may I inquire of the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Oklahoma any further motion or request to make?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I ask that the time be equally divided between myself and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL.]

The SPEAKER. Who controls the time?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The time to be controlled equally by the gentleman from Kansas and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally controlled by himself and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order, that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-one Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I move a call of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. Had not the gentleman made his motion to go into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then there will be an automatic call.

Mr. GARNER. The House was dividing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the House was dividing. The Chair had started to put the affirmative proposition, and the gentleman from New York raised the point of no quorum present.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Barnhart	Flood	Kreider	Scott, Pa.
Black	Flynn	LaGuardia	Scully
Bowers	Focht	Lea, Cal.	Sells
Buchanan	Francis	Lufkin	Siegel

Evans	Key, Ohio	Saunders, Va.	Zihlman
Fairchild, Geo. W.	Kiess, Pa.	Schall

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 342 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi for three days, beginning Tuesday and ending Thursday, on account of illness.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] has moved that the House go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and pending that motion he asks that the time be controlled half by himself and half by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8696) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] to make a brief statement.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there has been considerable agitation, both in and out of Congress, touching an increase of compensation of the employees of the Government. This is the first one of the regular appropriation bills to come before the House.

Mr. MADDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon—the second.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is correct. The Post Office appropriation bill has gone through the House, and when that was under consideration the statement was made that the matters of permanent increases were being considered by a subcommittee of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. It seemed proper, therefore, that something should be said to the House touching this subject matter, in order that there might not be unnecessary confusion in the consideration of appropriation bills, or unnecessary delay or cross purposes in working out this problem.

After considerable consultation with a number of gentlemen on both sides of the aisle, directly interested through their committee assignments in the appropriation bills, it has been generally thought advisable to deal with this entire question either in one appropriation bill or in a separate resolution, and therefore the various appropriating committees have not undertaken and will not undertake to present to the House, with their bills, the question of the increase of salaries of employees here in Washington and elsewhere.

Mr. MADDEN. I will ask the gentleman if he knows whether that applies to the postal employees?

Mr. SHERLEY. The Post Office bill has been completed, and therefore the consideration of that bill as an appropriation bill is ended so far as this House is concerned; but I see no reason why it should not be practicable to deal with the postal employees at the same time that the others are dealt with.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman for his information that the Post Office Committee are considering a separate bill for that purpose.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know that. The Post Office Committee has legislative jurisdiction, and, of course, has the right to report such legislation if it sees fit to do so.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. May I ask the gentleman if the Post Office appropriation bill carried any increases at all?

Mr. SHERLEY. It did not, as I recall.

Mr. MADDEN. It did in a way—in the way of promotions.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; but there was no general increase of salaries, irrespective of promotions.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. I think the legislation suggested by the gentleman from Illinois is in the nature of permanent legislation on behalf of the Post Office employees. The legislation referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky is a temporary proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. The legislation I have in mind is to deal with the situation now confronting the Government, and the plan does not contemplate permanent legislation.

Mr. KEATING. I am quite confident that the Post Office Committee is not dealing with that kind of legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky two minutes more.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes

Mr. DOWELL. Can the gentleman assure us that a separate bill will be presented to the House?

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to assure the House that there will be a bill presented, or rather a proposition presented, either as an incident to an appropriation bill or as a separate measure itself dealing with the question of increased salaries for all employees here and elsewhere for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And let me ask the gentleman if we have that added to some appropriation bill will it carry the necessary appropriation for employees throughout the service in other departments of the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably; we would not undertake to make provision for the increased compensation of employees without providing for the payment of such employees.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I did not hear the first of the gentleman's statement. I want to say that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries is to-day considering a proposition to increase the compensation of boiler inspectors and assistant boiler inspectors. Does that come within the province of the gentleman's statement?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no desire that such committees that can deal only legislatively with the various services of the Government should refrain from considering such matters if in their judgment the facts warrant such consideration, but they do not legislate in the way of appropriating, and all I am dealing with now in my statement to the House is in connection with temporary increases that are being asked and urged on Members of Congress touching Government employees generally on account of the present high cost of living.

Mr. DILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DILL. Do I understand that the proposition will be an increase by percentages?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not prepared to indicate or state what will be the judgment either of the committee reporting the proposition or of the House.

Mr. DILL. Do they intend to change the basic salaries?

Mr. SHERLEY. As a permanent proposition? No.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The Indian appropriation bill for the current fiscal year carries an appropriation from the Public Treasury of $11,574,736.67. The estimates furnished Congress by the department in December requested appropriations for this year of $12,255,210, a total of more than $680,000 in excess of the appropriation for the current fiscal year.

Your Committee on Indian Affairs, after several weeks' arduous labor, has succeeded in reducing departmental estimates for the ensuing fiscal year by $1,108,725, and recommends expenditures from the Treasury in the present bill of only $11,146,485.

Furthermore, the bill reported carries less appropriations than the current fiscal year by more than $428,000.

In view of the imperative demand for increase in production of farm products, the committee did not feel justified in making any radical reductions in items concerning irrigation, and of this, the gentleman from Arizona, who is well posted on that matter, expects to speak more at length.

The department had recommended very large increases at most of the nonreservation schools, due to the necessity for increased per capita cost. The committee attempted in these instances to meet the department estimates half way, which it is thought can be done without any serious damage to the schools and at the ame time without too greatly increasing the tax upon the Treasury.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How much increase does the committee recommend?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I can not furnish, offhand, definite information as to each school, but the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] has made some figures and he expects to give them accurately.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it uniform throughout the schools in the United States?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It is uniform throughout, based on the number appropriated for at each school. In all schools of less than 400 attendance a per capita of $200 was allowed and in schools of over 400 attendance a per capita of $185.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The present amount is $167 per capita.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; it was increased to $200 in schools of less than 400 and in schools of over 400 to $185.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Thirty-three dollars in one case and $18 in another.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; the Committee on Indian Affairs attempted to meet the department half way.

In view of the large war appropriations necessary, it was the opinion of the Interior Department and Indian Bureau that no new buildings should be specifically provided for during this session of Congress.

Many of the appropriations carried in this bill regularly every year are not authorized by law. This comes about on account of the fact that the Government supervision of the Indian was not a broad comprehensive plan laid out by any general law to start with; but the system, like Topsy, "just growed" by the adoption of an act here, the negotiation of a treaty, the consummation of an agreement at another place with different tribes, and in many instances simply the placing in this Indian bill of an appropriation for a certain purpose which was not then and is not now authorized by law.

During these many years various treaties and acts of Congress authorized regular annual expenditures by the Indian Bureau of considerable sums of money from tribal funds of different tribes without necessitating annual appropriations by Congress. In other words, the department was given carte blanche authority in the use of the tribal funds of several different tribes and were permitted to use these funds year after year without the necessity of coming to Congress for appropriations. In many instances it was not necessary to even make a report to Congress of the amount spent except in deference to special acts that were passed.

This was true of the funds of the Five Civilized Tribes particularly, until in the Indian appropriation act of 1912 an amendment was adopted which prevented further use of these tribal funds by the department except upon specific appropriation by Congress. An amendment proposed to the act of May 18, 1916, by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL] made a similar charge in this procedure with reference to Indians other than the Five Civilized Tribes, so that from now on it will be necessary for the departments and bureaus expecting to use these funds to make necessary estimates, placing them before Congress and the Indian Committee, giving Congress an opportunity to deal as intelligently with the funds of these wards as it does with its own Treasury funds.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the requirement of the Secretary extend to his designating in his estimate how much out of the tribal funds he is about to expend?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It does.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is the differentiation between tribal funds and United States Treasury funds?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes. Section 27 of the act of May 18, 1916, requires that after the current fiscal year no expenditures may be made from tribal funds except upon specific appropriation by Congress. This year one of the Indian Bureau officials brought to us a request for an appropriation for two and a half million dollars in a lump sum. The committee was not willing to appropriate the money in that way and told him that that did not comply with the law. Finally, he referred us to a certain House document showing how that money was specifically expended last year. So we recommended the two and a half million authorization to be expended out of the tribal funds, but required it to be expended in accordance with the provisions and the item in the House document, which makes it a specific appropriation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Referring to a specific case in my own State, the Chippewas, by treaty with the Government, agreed that a certain amount should be expended by the Government for their education and benefit each year. We have heretofore been doing that by appropriating about $185,000 in a lump sum. Does not the gentleman think it might be advisable to go a step further and itemize that lump sum the same as we itemize other things in the bill?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I certainly think that ought to be done.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. With the greatest care the officers in the Indian Office here may exercise certain abuses are bound to creep in. I recall discovering to my amazement and the amazement of the department when it was shown to them that in one place they had six Indian farmers, where there was not work enough for one good man. The Indians are paying for all of that. Had that item ever appeared before the committee of which the distinguished gentleman is the chairman it never would have appeared in the bill. I might mention others, but that convinced me, with some other things which came to my attention, that it would be advisable, and the Indian Department ought to desire it, that all these expenditures out of tribal funds shall be made through the appropriation coming from the Indian Committee, and itemized so that we as well as the Indians may know what their money is being expended for. I might refer to one other thing. The Indian schools in my State, as the gentleman knows, are not provided for by the Government, but are paid for out of the tribal funds. In addition, we have Indian agents throughout the State. We have superintendents of schools and we have agents and clerks and employees. I spent a year trying to find how the superintendents of those schools were paid, where they drew their salaries, out of what fund it came, and how much the salaries were. I spent an equal length of time trying to find out where the agents received their appointments, out of what funds they are paid, and how much. It seems there is an interchangeability of agents and superintendents of schools. I have no criticism of the system, but we really ought to have a way of knowing just exactly the organization that exists not only in Minnesota but in the gentleman's State and in other States.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We have it in my State.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is very proper, and I think the gentleman has been more active in behalf of the interests of the Indians of his State than the Minnesota delegation has been active in behalf of the Indians of their own State, but we ought to have that prevail in every State.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the situation is just this: Your committee found that the departments of this Government, under standing appropriations, had been right along, each year, expending tribal funds to the extent of two and a half million dollars without any supervision whatever by any branch of the National Congress. Certainly this Government has no more right to expend the trust funds of its wards in such loose, haphazard manner than to expend its own funds in that way. Now, there is not a Member of this House who, with the possible exception of the exigencies of war times, would think for a moment of turning over sums of money like this to any department with carte blanche authority to use them in many instances without even accounting to Congress for the funds after the expenditures have been made. When a man takes the position that because these funds are not appropriated from the Federal Treasury this House or Congress can afford to handle them in this loose manner, he places himself in the untenable and ridiculous position that a man may handle trust funds more carelessly, loosely, and recklessly than his own.

Mr. DILL. Will the gentleman explain how this bill ties up the appropriation with the estimates of the departments?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. DILL. The gentleman stated that the department has asked lump appropriations, and we have insisted upon estimates. Will the gentleman now explain——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Washington is familiar with that; I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. DILL. I do not care to make part of the gentleman's speech, but I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that the committee so worded the bill—I do not happen to have a copy in my hand—tying up the appropriations of this two and a half million dollars to the House document prepared by the Indian Department making estimates for expenditures for next year, so that we are meeting the criticism of the gentleman from Minnesota when he suggests that we ought to limit them to the particular amounts for particular purposes. It is not in the bill as written but refers directly to the House document which contains the estimates and which limits the department to the expenditure of not to exceed the amount estimated. I refer to House document 499. I simply wanted to make that clear, that the bill does not leave it purely as a lump-sum appropriation, but in fact it does the very thing which the gentleman from Minnesota was speaking about.

Mr. SNYDER. It also fixes it so that they must bring in next year a clear financial report and statement on each one of the items under which the expenditures are made.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Furthermore, that in the future they must come before the Committee on Indian Affairs with their estimates, just as they come with estimates for money that is expended from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROSE. I notice on page 4 of the committee report, referring to the Indian school at Carlisle, that last year the appropriation was $152,250, and this year it is $147,000, and that the hearings are found on page 310. Was that decrease made with the knowledge of the people who were here in the interest of the Carlisle school?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No one appeared in the interest of the Carlisle school except the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I see from the hearings that we gave exactly what the superintendent estimated.

Mr. ROSE. Then that is all right.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It has been the policy of the Indian Committee and Congress ever since I have been a Member to supplement the use of Treasury funds by tribal funds wherever it could be fairly done and without a violation of some treaty obligation with the Indians.

Take the State of Oklahoma, for instance, where one-third the Indians of the United States live. This bill authorizes specifically the expenditure in Oklahoma of $1,823,993.31, which is exclusive of per capita payments. Of this amount $818,120 is authorized to be expended from the Federal Treasury, and $1,005,873.31 is authorized to be expended from the tribal funds, which makes the specific appropriations from tribal funds exceed by almost $200,000 the amount appropriated from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will.

Mr. WELLING. I want to know the difference between the expenditures from tribal funds and what the gentleman calls "Treasury funds."

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, a good many tribes have funds deposited in the Treasury to their credit. When an authorization is made to spend money from the tribal funds it authorizes the Secretary to take the money from those funds deposited in the Treasury belonging to the tribe and that when an appropriation is made directly from the Treasury it is taken out of the Treasury funds as a gratuity.

Mr. WELLING. I notice the gentleman from Minnesota said that the Indians in his State paid for their own education from the tribal funds.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. As I recall, Minnesota is the one State in the Union with any considerable number of Indians that cost this Government very little, with the exception of nonreservation schools for her Indians.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And if the gentleman will permit me to add, this very school at Pipestone is not of so much advantage to the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota as it is to the Indians of other States.

Mr. WELLING. But it is paid from the funds of the Indians from Minnesota?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. While that nonreservation school is supported by a gratuity from the Government, it is not an asset to the Chippewas of Minnesota.

Mr. WELLING. I wondered upon what theory the committee, in their bill, charged the Indians of one particular locality for their education from the Indian funds and provided funds from the Treasury of the United States for the education of all other Indians.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I can just repeat what I have just stated, that for years it has been the policy of the Committee on Indian Affairs and of Congress, as gentlemen who have been here for some time know, to supplement appropriations from the Treasury by appropriations from the tribal funds wherever that could be done without doing an injustice to the Indian tribe or violating a treaty.

That was thought to be a good policy for several reasons: First, from the standpoint of economy for the Federal Treasury; second, there was no good purpose to be served by paying a man's expenses who was able to pay his own way. And some have thought that it might be a good object lesson in self-sustenance and self-reliance to let the Indian know that he was not an object of charity by giving him to understand that he was paying his own way. This, of course, should not be done to the injustice of the Indian nor in violation of a treaty obligation.

Mr. DILL. I might say, further, in answer to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING], that these tribal funds in practically every instance are funds that come from the sale of timber, or land, or other property formerly belonging to the Indians; and in practically every one of the laws providing for those sales there is a statement to the effect that this money may be used for the civilization and support—or wording to that effect—of these Indians, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. And, using that as an authorization, for years the Indian Department has dipped into tribal funds for such amounts as it happened to desire, in addition to the money appropriated by Congress for education and civilization purposes.

Mr. WELLING. Then I submit, Mr. Chairman, it would seem to be a wise policy to use all the tribal funds now in the Treasury of the United States for these purposes rather than to take it from the Treasury itself.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It would; and that is the purpose of the committee, I assert again. Whenever the committee can do so without any violence to the rights of the Indians or their treaties it is being done. I think I just made the statement—perhaps the gentleman did not catch it—that in the State of Oklahoma there are used some $1,800,000, some $800,000 coming out of the Treasury and over a million from the tribal fund.

Mr. WELLING. The records which the committee has furnished the House show what there is in the fund to the credit of the Indians of Oklahoma now. Why not use that instead of taking the money out of the Treasury?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. There is being used $1,000,000 a year, which is every dollar that can be taken out of the tribal funds of the Indians of Oklahoma without violating the treaty, and some of that is done with the consent of Congressmen from Oklahoma and of the Indians themselves.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There is just one question I was about to ask, which does not refer to the present discussion, perhaps. I understand there are certain funds available for the purpose of purchasing cattle for breeding purposes for the Indians. Is that taken care of in this bill?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In what clause?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In two clauses, one on page 14, $100,000, and then under "Oregon," on page 51, the gentleman will find $200,000 for the Klamath Indians.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Now, here is what I have in mind. I understand that these purchases are made on written specifications, specifying the kind of cattle required. The particular country that I come from is particularly interested in a special breed of cattle called the Angus. I am informed that for many years the purchasing agents, or those who purchase, have been specifying Hereford and Shorthorn cattle exclusively, and that this is to the detriment and injury of stock raisers who are raising the Angus breed of cattle, which they claim will thrive in these semiarid countries. Can the gentleman give me any information about the situation as regards that?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, that, as the gentleman knows, is strictly an administrative proposition. It has never been the policy of the House to direct the Indian Bureau or the Secretary of the Interior as to just the proper kind of cattle he should buy, that being left largely to his judgment. Therefore no information was obtained from the commissioner when he was before the committee with reference to that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. You do not know whether my information on that subject is correct or not?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I have no information whatever about it. If what the gentleman says is true, it perhaps does injustice to a certain breed of cattle, and I think if the gentleman will take that up with the Indian Bureau he might get results. If he did not, and he would come back to Congress, the Indian Committee would be glad to give him consideration on it.

Mr. NORTON. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] that he is correct, and that the specifications only call for Shorthorn and Hereford cattle, some registered and some grade. The reason is this, that experience has shown that on the larger ranges the Hereford cattle do much better than any of the other beef breeds, and why the Hereford and Shorthorns are selected rather than the Angus is for this reason, that in cross-breeding the Hereford and Shorthorns are found to be better than the Angus; and if the gentleman is acquainted with the Angus breed of cattle and their qualities, and their advantages and disadvantages for the range, he will perceive it to be true that the Angus breed of cattle will do best when they are kept out of that particular breed and not used for crossing purposes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that the Indian lands now have been allotted and that each Indian has been allotted 160 or 320 acres of land, as the case might be, and that they do not have the advantage of the large range that the gentleman speaks of, and which I think he is correct about, so far as the Herefords are concerned? But the Indian is required to keep his cattle on his own piece of land, is he not?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In some cases; yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. And the purchase of these cattle will be for a small tract of land instead of a range?

Mr. NORTON. The cattle are sold for the most part to the individual Indian, and he is required to account for those cattle and reimburse the Government for the cattle. It comes from a reimbursable fund.

That is the reason for the distinction, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois. It is not because the department has any particular prejudice against the Angus breed, but because the Shorthorns and Herefords are found to be better breeds for the purpose than the Angus.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have no particular knowledge about the matter, but I am voicing what I have been told by breeders of that particular kind of cattle. I will say that later in this discussion if I think that I have any information available and pertinent to this proposition, I will ask for five minutes in which to discuss the subject.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman can certainly get that time.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from North Dakota use some of his time.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the situation with respect to the failure of the people to get coal throughout the United States is of sufficient importance to warrant my calling it to the attention of the Congress. I noticed this morning that the Fuel Commissioner has either issued an order or is about to issue one to close the factories of the United States for a given period or periods in order that fuel may be supplied to the homes.

Well, the people are not getting fuel in the homes now. They have not been getting it, and they are not likely to get it as long as the present incompetent administration of the fuel situation exists.

Some time since the President of the United States fixed the price of coal to the operator, and at the price then fixed by the President most of the operators are making 100 per cent profit. The intention of fixing the price high, I suppose, was to encourage the output of a greater quantity of coal and to give larger compensation to the miners. However that may be, we have not been able to get the coal, and the price fixed by the President of the United States has not been enforced, for coal men are charging as much more than the price fixed as it is possible to obtain. They have no conscience.

Now we are told that it is necessary, in order that the homes may be supplied with coal, that we close the factories. If there ever was a time in the history of America when the factories should be open and speeded up this is the time. If we are going to conclude this war successfully we are not going to be able to do it by closing the factories. The people who are able to get coal at all now are forced to buy it at an exorbitant price, and the order issued by the Fuel Administrator has the effect of closing the opportunity of these people who own homes or rent them and of taking away from them the opportunity of earning money with which to buy the coal that they need. It is an embarrassing situation.

Then, I understand that in the determination of this question it is proposed to refuse to take any more freight on the railroads until the tracks are cleared of what freight is there now. The congestion must be removed. Well, we did not need a Director General of Railroads to do that. Anybody could do it. All you have got to do is to stop taking freight and run the locomotives that are on the tracks, and the cars will soon be moved from one end of the railroad to the other.

They say there is not any coal. They are not able to get supplies. I went a short distance over a railroad the other day and I found 15 miles of loaded cars, on sidetracks, not being moved; and if I could see 15 miles of loaded cars on sidetracks in a distance of less than 100 miles, I presume it could be said safely that there are more than a thousand miles of loaded coal cars on sidetracks that are not being moved to the places where they need the coal. What we need is the speeding up of the management, not the speeding up of the mines so much, for we are producing the coal. To-day we can not get the cars to move the coal because we are not clearing the tracks. That is all there is to it.

Now, if you wanted to run the railroads successfully, it was not necessary for the Government, in my judgment, to take them over. All we needed to do was——

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Will the gentleman let me interpose one thing right there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to say that last May I called the attention of this House to a trip that I made to St. Louis, wherein my son and I counted a thousand cars, at that time on sidetracks, that were not moving. I called the attention of the department to it at that time, but nothing has been done about it since.

Mr. MADDEN. What we needed to do more than anything else, in my judgment, was to take the "strait-jacket" off of them in the form of the interstate-commerce law, the Sherman Act, and allow them to coordinate their equipment and tracks and terminals under the skill and genius of men who have given their lifetime to the operation of the railroads. No; we could not use the genius and experience of the railroad men, and we could not take the "strait-jacket" off of the railroads to allow them to operate the railroad successfully. We had to put a director general in charge, a man who knows nothing whatever about railroads; and he seems to be qualifying for his job by letting the most important man he had on his staff, Mr. Willard, go yesterday. It seems to me that what they need up here at the other end of the Avenue is some experience. They say we ought to have patriotism to support the administration. Yes; we ought to have patriotism to support the administration, and we have, and we ought to support the administration; but we want the administration to support the people in the effort to do the things that are necessary if we are going to win this war.

We have 1,500,000 men, either in camps or in the field. Thousands of them have died because of lack of clothing; some because of lack of fuel. Now, the time is coming when the people are not going to submit to the death of these men without protest. We ought to have a list of the men who die from pneumonia and other diseases and of the men who die in these camps because of inattention. I know of a case myself where a thousand men were sent to the recruiting barracks after they were enlisted, and held there for four or five days without a place to sleep, and without a stitch of clothes except those they wore when they came there, and were compelled to sleep on the stone floor without any heat. They were then given something to eat on the day they were being shipped to the camp, at 3.25 o'clock in the afternoon.

At 7 o'clock in the evening they were marched to the freight yard of the Baltimore & Ohio Road without anything more to eat, kept there until 10 o'clock before the train was backed in, and they were loaded onto refrigerator cars—I say refrigerator cars because there was no heat on them. They were carried in those cars for 27 hours without a bite to eat. Several of the men were taken off the train at the end of that 27-hour period raving maniacs. I say it is time that somebody was calling the attention of the country to this situation. Patriotic, yes! We need patriotism to call attention to these things, and the coal situation is one of the things about which the people are not going to allow the Government to trifle. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has expired. Under the previous order of the House the committee will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 8696) and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. Under the order heretofore adopted the House will stand in recess until 3 o'clock.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 3 o'clock p. m.

The recess having expired, the House resumed its session.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Mr. ASHBROOK, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the following cases, no adverse report having been filed thereon:

Crawford Byers (H. R. 19002), Sixty-fourth Congress;

William T. O'Bannon (H. R. 17511), Sixty-fourth Congress; and David A. Banks (H. R. 17514), Sixty-fourth Congress.

FUEL.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GILLETT. I doubt if the Clerk can read it. May I read it instead?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the House regrets the summary action of the Fuel Administrator in suddenly closing the industries dependent upon a coal supply, and in view of the disorganization of business certain to follow and the consequent idleness and distress of labor urges a reconsideration of the order by the President, and that final action be taken only after being fully advised of its effect.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I reserve the right to object. Mr. Speaker, as the House well knows, we have arranged to go on with one of the supply bills of the Government, to conclude the general debate by some time to-morrow if we can; and the gentleman from Massachusetts knows that this resolution will precipitate quite a lot of debate.

Mr. GILLETT. But, on the other hand, it must be passed to-day if at all, because the order goes into effect to-morrow. The Senate is considering it to-day.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In the absence of the leader on this side I would not like to proceed with the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GILLETT. Suppose we wait for an hour.

Mr. LENROOT. When the leaders come in, will the gentleman move that the committee rise, so that the request can then be made?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will be perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If they agree upon it among themselves.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will agree to this, Mr. Speaker, that when our majority leaders in the House get back I will move that the committee rise in order that this request may be presented.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to let this resolution go through by unanimous consent, either now or when the committee rises.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman will not even let it be considered?

Mr. COX. No; not by unanimous consent.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will take the chair temporarily until the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] coms in.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 8696), with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the Chair how much time I consumed this morning?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma has consumed 36 minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have been requested to make a statement in regard to the changes made in the bill now under consideration respecting the appropriations for Indian boarding schools. I think it proper that such a statement should be made in view of the fact that almost every appropriation in the bill has been altered in some manner. Last year there was appropriated for the support of 28 Indian boarding schools a total of $1,766,720. The Indian Bureau this year requested that $1,926,250 be appropriated for this purpose. In the present bill we have allowed $1,811,500 for the support of Indian boarding schools, an increase of about 8 per cent over the total appropriation made last year.

The Indian Office in its estimates asks that the expenditures at all Indian schools having an attendance of 500 or less pupils be increased to $200 per capita, and that in the larger schools where the attendance is over 500 an increase be made to $185 per capita. The Committee on Indian Affairs, in considering this matter, decided to reduce the average increase by making it $185 per capita in schools having an enrollment of 400 or over and $200 per capita in schools having an enrollment of less than 400 pupils.

At the following Indian schools no change was made in the number of pupils and the per capita expenditure was increased from $167 to $200. The increase for support and education of the pupils at each school was as follows:

At Truxton Canyon, Ariz.: Increase, $3,300.

At Fort Bidwell, Cal.: Increase, $3,300.

At Greenville, Cal.: Increase, $3,300.

At Carson City, Nev.: Estimate of 300 pupils not allowed; increase, $9,570.

At Bismarck, N. Dak.: Increase, $3,125.
At Pierre, S. Dak.: Increase, $8,250.
At Rapid City, S. Dak.: Increase, $9,075.
At Tomah, Wis.: Increase, $9,075.

At the following Indian schools, accommodating 400 or more pupils, the per capita was increased from $167 to $185. In each case the average enrollment and attendance closely approximated the number of pupils named in the bill. The increase at each school is as follows:

At Phoenix, Ariz.: Increase, $12,600.
At Albuquerque, N. Mex.: Increase, $8,100.
At Santa Fe, N. Mex.: Increase, $7,200.
At Fort Totten, N. Dak.: Increase, $7,200.
At Salem, Oreg.: Increase, $10,800.

At the Haskell Institute, Lawrence, Kans., the Committee on Indian Affairs increased the per capita expenditure to $185 and allowed the number of pupils to remain at 750, although the average enrollment was 711 and the average attendance but 628. The increase for the support and education of the pupils at this school is therefore $13,600. The committee took this action because of its decision to make no further appropriations for the maintenance of the Indian school at Kickapoo, Kans., thus saving the $14,860 which was spent at that school last year. The 80 pupils who are in attendance at the Kickapoo school can be transferred to the Haskell Institute, where there are ample accommodations for them. So, even with the increased appropriation at Haskell, there is an actual saving on the total expenditure for the Indian schools in the State of Kansas.

At the Sherman Institute, Riverside, Cal., the average attendance of pupils was 577, with an enrollment of 680. We therefore reduced the number of pupils from 700 to 680 and increased the per capita from $167 to $185, making a net increase of $8,900.

At the following Indian schools the per capita was increased from $167 to $200, but on examining the justifications submitted by the Indian Bureau your committee discovered that the actual enrollment and attendance of pupils at these schools in no case equaled the number named in the estimates. The committee, therefore, reduced the number of pupils at each of these schools, so that the bill as reported more nearly conforms with the true conditions:

At Mount Pleasant, Mich.: Pupils reduced from 400 to 350; net increase, $3,200.

At Pipestone, Minn.: Pupils reduced from 225 to 200; net increase, $2,475.

At Genoa, Nebr.: Pupils reduced from 400 to 380; net increase, $9,200.

At Wahpeton, N. Dak.: Pupils reduced from 220 to 200; net increase, $3,260.

At Flandreau, S. Dak.: Pupils reduced from 365 to 350; net increase $9,045.

At Hayward, Wis.: Pupils reduced from 250 to 230; net increase, $5,250.

At Shoshone, Wyo.: Pupils reduced from 175 to 150; net increase, $1,025.

By reason of the reduction in the number of pupils at the Indian schools at Ft. Mohave, Ariz., and at Carlisle, Pa., it was possible to actually decrease the appropriations, notwithstanding the increase in the per capita allowance. At Ft. Mohave it was shown at the hearing that there were actually in attendance only 141 pupils, with an average enrollment of 147, so that the number in that school was reduced from 200 to 150, and the per capita increased from $167 to $200, leaving a net decrease of $3,800.

At Carlisle, Pa., the number of pupils was reduced from 800 to 700 and the per capita increased to $185, with the result that there is a net decrease in the appropriation of $4,250. This action was taken in accordance with the estimates submitted by the Indian Bureau.

At the Cushman School, Tacoma, Wash., the number of pupils was reduced from 350 to 325, and the gratuity appropriation was increased by $5,000, from $60,000 to $65,000. Funds of the Puyallup Indians are used to supplement this appropriation so that it was deemed to be unnecessary to allow the increase of $10,000, as requested in the estimates.

At Cherokee, N. C., the number of pupils was increased from 180 to 200, there being 194 actually in attendance, and an enrollment of 233. The superintendent in his estimates asked for $32,958. If we had followed the recommendation of the Indian Bureau and increased the per capita to $200 for 200 pupils, including the superintendent's salary, the total amount appropriated would have been $41,600.

In the estimates submitted by the superintendent was a request for the construction of a bridge across the Oconalufty River, near the school. Inasmuch as the superintendent of this school has demonstrated his ability and fitness by operating it at a less per capita cost than any other Indian boarding school in the United States, we decided to give him a little more than he asked for, or $33,600, and allow $8,000 toward the construction of the bridge, one-half of its cost to be paid either by the State of North Carolina or by the county in which the bridge and school are located.

This sums up the situation with respect to all of the Indian schools, except that at Chilocco, Okla. We did not increase the per capita expenditure at that school, but allowed it to remain at $167 for the reason that there is attached to that school a large area of land—eight or nine thousand acres—of which over 6,000 acres are cultivated by the pupils of the school. The agricultural products produced on this land last year amounted to $40,656, which helped to support the school. The Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs testified that this school could get along very well with the same per capita of $167 as has been allowed heretofore. If the usual per capita of $185 had been allowed at Chilocco, there would have been an increase of $10,000. Instead of doing that we allowed an additional appropriation of $10,000 for the construction of a road across the tract of land which belongs to the school, and which is badly needed.

I have also been asked, Mr. Chairman, to make a statement relative to the appropriations made for the various Indian irrigation projects as provided in this bill. The total appropriations under the current law for Indian irrigation projects is $1,882,700. The amounts contained in the estimates equal $2,807,700. After careful consideration, the committee reduced the estimates by $498,950 and allowed a total of $2,308,750. The following tabulation shows the various appropriations which the committee has recommended to be made in the several States for Indian irrigation works:

Uinta Reservation, payable from tribal funds	341	40,000	150,000	150,000

In order to make these increased appropriations for irrigation works it was necessary to make a reduction somewhere if the total carried in the bill was not to be raised. After consideration the committee decided that the appropriation of $400,000 heretofore made for the purchase of tribal herds, to be placed on Indian reservations, should be reduced to $100,000. The committee concluded that, as a matter of fact, the grass and water on all the Indian reservations are being fully utilized by the Indians themselves or by lessees who have obtained permits to graze cattle or sheep.

By the purchase of tribal herds it has been necessary to reduce the number of live stock grazed by lessees on Indian lands, since there was not room for more cattle or sheep. There has therefore been no actual increase in meat production on the reservations by the purchase of tribal herds.

Neither does the committee agree that it is good policy to establish a tribal herd on Indian reservations, because such herds in no way serve to individualize the efforts of the Indians. To hire a white man to supervise and manage a tribal herd does not in the least assist the Indians to become self-supporting. Wherever there are progressive Indians it is the practice of the Indian Service to issue to them a certain number of cattle or sheep and the Indians agree to repay the cost of such live stock on specified terms of payment, thereby acquiring individual property for which they are responsible. This plan has been demonstrated to be of real benefit to the Indians and the committee heartily approves of it. But we reduced the appropriation for tribal herds and provided that the sum of money thus saved be devoted to the irrigation of the arid land susceptible of cultivation on Indian reservations so as to encourage an increase in crop production.

It is fortunate indeed that construction work on the various Indian irrigation projects has been so far advanced during the past five or six years. There are now available considerable areas which have been and are being placed under crop to produce the food so badly needed by the people of the world at the present time. The report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shows that there are under irrigation this year on the various Indian reservations 256,000 acres of land. There are at least another 100,000 acres under constructed works, which I am assured he is making every effort to have placed in cultivation at once, so that the Indians are contributing an increasing share toward the production of foodstuffs. Irrigation is now coming into its own. Those who doubted the possibility of reclaiming the deserts are now convinced of the great benefits of the wise policy we have advocated. The reports of the Reclamation Service show that in the past year 200,000 new acres of land have been placed under cultivation, and greater crops are being grown on existing farms. The irrigated lands in America are doing their full share toward the production of the foodstuffs necessary to win the war. If we had been planning ahead as to how we might best sustain ourselves, as did the Germans when they plotted this war, we would have done the very things that we have done to promote the irrigation of the arid lands in the Western States.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman knows that there are millions of acres of uncultivated good farm land in the country to-day where the raising of crops requires no irrigation. Now, if the Government was going to expend a hundred thousand dollars or a million dollars to encourage agriculture, does the gentleman believe that the expenditure would best be made on land that required irrigation or land that required no irrigation?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am more familiar with the irrigated land than any other kind, and I would unhesitatingly recommend an appropriation for the construction of irrigation projects. I want to make it perfectly clear to the gentleman from North Dakota that as far as I am concerned I have done and shall continue to do everything possible to increase the cultivation of the irrigated as well as the unirrigated land. I think Congress has done exceptionally well in that regard by the passage of the Federal farm-loan act and other like measures, all of which, in my opinion, were wise, just, and proper. I am glad that such laws have been passed, in order that the farmers of the whole country may be benefited thereby.

Mr. NORTON. It occurred to me that the Government should first consider the lands that are likely to give the most production with the least expenditure of money, rather than to go out in some waste part of the country, where the country and the soil have to be civilized, and when that is done the land has to irrigated.

Mr. HAYDEN. Taking the gentleman's own statement, I believe that an expenditure, dollar for dollar, in irrigating the arid lands of the West will bring as great a return as upon any other land in the United States. I state that unqualifiedly. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be my duty to address the House upon my return from war-torn Europe and to submit to it some conclusions and impart information which I hope will be of some value.

I have spent most of the last two months there, and during that time visited the American headquarters and some of the American camps in France. I traveled along the English front from Calais nearly to St. Quentin, and along the French front from St. Quentin to Verdun. I traveled along the Italian front from Venice and the mouth of the Piave to the Asiago plateau. I also visited Paris and Rome. Many of the places to which I went I had visited often before this great war.

My information has been gathered from many sources; from personal observations and from conversations with men of various nationalities in military, naval, diplomatic, political, and other employment.

America wants the truth, and it is vital that America have the truth. The picture of the military situation in Europe as reproduced in America is often not true, particularly in relation to America's military efforts there and the conditions in Germany. The truth in Europe, where America is to play her great and victorious part, is that to-day the central powers have achieved all of their greater military objectives, with the exception of the taking of Paris, the attempt to take Verdun being part of that purpose.

Autocracy in Europe has democracy by the throat and is strangling it. The reasons for the success of autocracy are that autocracy is organized, deals more in deeds than rhetoric, and modern autocracies are masculine and not feminine. Democracy to be successful in this, the greatest struggle in arms of all times, must organize better than autocracy, drop rhetoric for deeds, and become masculine. When America, the greatest and most representative of democracies, does these things democracy will be successful.

I found the French soldiers and people courageous and unwavering in their dauntless loyalty. There is no avoiding the truth, however, that France is war worn and has passed her meridian in man power and effort. She has plenty of food, with the exception of wheat and sugar. She has excellent military and political leadership.

I found England's war efforts splendidly organized and her equipment complete. The English Army is cheerful and confident. Large losses, such as 200,000 men in the last two months, I have heard criticized as unnecessary. The truth, however, is that England is at the height of her power, but it is a height which she can maintain, undoubtedly, for one or more years. Under these circumstances, after three and one-half years of war, it seems impossible for France and England to obtain a military decision, and France and England frankly admit the absolute necessity of a colossal effort on the part of America.

Much evidence shows that although Germany is very short of food she is not starving, and that the food situation in Germany is not as bad in some essential particulars as it was a year ago. There is also much evidence that Germany to-day has a larger number of men under arms than at any other time during the war, although their quality is not as good as formerly. The real social and political conditions in Germany are not much known, but it is not thought that there will be a revolution until after the war.

The results in France of American efforts up to the 1st of December in a strictly military way have been practically negligible. The number of men there is much smaller than the American public believes, and, although food and clothing were good in amount and quality, the lack of general supplies has a most demoralizing effect upon all preparations and efforts. I am not speaking of American artillery, aeroplanes, machine guns, and ammunition, about which the American public now knows, but of all other general supplies so necessary for making war—such supplies as auto trucks, machinery, tools, wood, nails, camp kitchens, and many other absolutely essential things. Neither France nor England have these supplies in sufficient quantities to spare them to America, and unless, with any new troops that are sent across, general supplies accompany them in sufficient amount, their presence in France will be a burden rather than a help. France and England have furnished to Italy men, guns, ammunition, and general supplies, so that a further drain upon them will be a source of much weakness.

I saw some of the finest trees in France being cut for lumber. Modern war can not be carried on without lumber in large amounts, yet there was not sufficient lumber to be used by the French and English troops in France. It is my fixed opinion that the sending of more American troops without adequate general supplies will be a disastrous blunder.

The situation in Italy on the economic side is very perilous. All of the people north of Rome live on wheat and corn meal, and on the 1st of December there was only three months' supplies on hand. Unless America is able to supply wheat and corn meal to Italy in sufficient quantities before it is too late, a revolution such as occurred in Russia will not be unlikely. The Italian soldiers are fighting with great valor and skill, but their supplies, hospital service, and food are not such as a modern army absolutely requires.

The submarine situation is much more acute than the people are allowed to believe. The total allied and neutral tonnage sunk per month, which is not totaled for publication, exceeds the new tonnage launched, and this has been so for many months and will exceed the new tonnage launched until July 1, even if the plans of the allied and neutral governments are all carried through successfully. The Mediterranean is practically controlled by the submarines, and the number of submarines and their efficiency seem to be increasing, although the American and British efforts against the submarines have been crowned with much success.

It is thought by those best informed on military matters that a supreme commander of all military efforts of the allies should be chosen and given full power and authority. From the North Sea to the Adriatic is one front, and the immense advantages of a central command are incontestable.

The best informed men in France and England believe a decisive military decision can not be reached before 1919 or 1920, when America will be able to contribute her real military strength.

The war for America is a war of transportation, and America should concentrate all possible effort on the manufacture of a huge ocean tonnage to make up for the great destruction of ships which has taken place, and the carrying to and maintaining of American efforts in France. Wheat and corn should be immediately sent to Italy to prevent a revolution; America should contribute a large and splendidly equipped air service, and America should at once send to American bases in France a very much increased amount of general supplies.

The winning of the war rests completely in the hands of America; in her forests, her furnaces, her farms, her men, her energy, and her will. This war, cost what it may, in blood or treasure, strength and sacrifice, must be won for America's honor and America's future. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article published in the Boston Transcript.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The article is as follows:

[Reprinted from New York Tribune.]

STARTLING PICTURE OF CONDITIONS AFTER FIVE MONTHS—ILL-SHOD, STILL BORROWING GUNS, FOOD SUPPLIES ONLY DAYS AHEAD, LABOR LACKING, AND MAIN BASE OF SUPPLIES 3,000 MILES AWAY.

[By Casper Whitney.]

I have come back from France so impressed by the gravity of the situation, for us, for our allies, that I do not restrain the patriotic fervor which moves me to plain speaking, in the hope that our people may the more quickly comprehend the conditions on which the timely recommendations of the E. M. House commission are founded and understand the imperative need—

For supporting the President and Congress in the endeavor to eliminate bungling in our war preparations.

For insisting upon the replacement of incompetence and red tape with efficiency and clear vision in the main arteries of our war-making machine.

For trying to realize to the full the depth of their own responsibility for this hour of disquieting revelations.

It is helpful to recall that two years ago Gen. Leonard Wood told a congressional investigating committee quite as frankly as has Col. House of the deficiencies in guns, equipment, and supplies of all kinds—only to fall victim to the politicians, who could not bear the truth, and bring down on his head the wrath of bureau chiefs and the raging criticism of pacifists and pro-Germans.

The people then ignored his ample and repeated warning, his unceasing and urgent advocacy of preparedness. If now the significant and searching House recommendations—implied as well as explicit—shall fall on ears equally deaf; if now the criticism of basic faults of system be viewed merely as "unfriendly," then will America fail in her duty toward her allies and the toll of your sons and brothers and fathers in France, oh, complacent people, will be heavy and distressing.

To take lightly these House recommendations, with all they indicate of past failure, or to judge frank comment as inspired only by "unfriendliness," will be to augur ill for our troops and their chances.

Unless the reorganization now making for the business of war reaches to the very fundamentals, regardless of "age, conditions of mind, or previous servitude" of incumbents and traditions along the way, the price of our experience in France ere the bloody tale compel recognition is destined to be beyond present reckoning.

There is for us now but one consideration, pertinent or tolerable, viz, the care and the effectiveness of our fighting force in France, that we may fulfill our obligations to our allies and to our soldiers.

Half measures will not suffice; the trouble is too deeply seated. Switching incompetents from one office into another will not repair bungling. When the lives of our men and the success of our cause are the issue there can be no doubt of the course we should take.

In such spirit it is that I approach this dutiful, though distasteful piece of writing, trusting its genuineness may lead to an awakened activity of our people, and thus to the efficiency, without which we can not wage the righteous war to a successful conclusion.

THE FACTS OF THE CASE.

It is a jolt to hear American efficiency, as represented by the United States Army supply and transportation service, referred to in France as a "joke," but it is a severer jolt to discover the multiple causes which have given it currency.

For five months, at the date of which I write—December 25—the American troops had been in France, and the showing of its supply and transportation service is as follows:

Five days' advance rations.

Shortage of shirts and ponchos.

No reserves of heavy shoes to replace the lighter ones, which were not adapted to service in France and have not worn well; or of clothing which is not warm enough, and, as to overcoat, ill-suited to trench work.

No rubber boots, and already a few cases of "trench feet," that strangely crippling development of this war, are appearing. Trench feet—and we as yet only playing at war.

No hats. There were really 65.

No woolen socks, except those furnished to the hospitals by the Red Cross.

No machine guns or reserves of rifles.

No artillery save that got from the French and much of the rifle and all of the artillery ammunition drawn from the French and the British.

No labor with which to complete cantonments—French soldier labor having been loaned for those already built—and permanently establish the line of communication between the sea and the American sector.

'Tis not a picture to kindle our pride, but is it not one to lift us out of our complacency, to give us fear for the ineptitude that menaces the health and the military fitness of our soldiers?

THE LUCKY RED CROSS.

And with the Army thus suffering through supply and transportation shortage, I found the warehouses of the Red Cross in France comfortably stocked (although an entire trainload of provisions had just been sent to Italy) with beans, rice, condensed milk, canned beef, and some sugar, for the service of their canteens in the French Army (where they are doing fine and needed work), and motor truckage enough for their requirements. Each buys in the same market; each is 3,000 miles from its base; each dependent on the same trans-Atlantic service. The Government, through its Quartermaster Department, has, of course, advantage in the open market or in the bid for cargo space; but the Red Cross is managed by business men on business principles. That's the answer to the otherwise incomprehensible situation of the Army being without reserves of needed supplies, while the Red Cross had full warehouses, though it is furnishing 25,000 meals a day through its canteens.

Fourth-fifths or, in round numbers, 4,000,000, of the automobiles of the world are in the United States and are made here, the annual output being valued at approximately $1,000,000,000.

The other day a train of 30 motor trucks made a successful run from Detroit to Baltimore—600 miles (a distance considerably more than twice as far as from the sea to American field headquarters in France)—finished on schedule, in evidence of the serviceability of the American-built car.

JOB LOT SECOND-HAND MOTORS.

Three months after the arrival of the first division in France there were substantially no trucks for transport service, or automobiles, except a job lot of second-hand cars, which had been picked up here and there at long prices. Then came a certain number of 1½-ton trucks. These wholly inadequate carriers—of a class long since discarded by all the armies of the world in favor of the more practical and more economical 3 and 5 ton type—are still the main reliance of our Army in France.

Of motor trucks of all kinds the Army had in the first week of last month (December) a carrying capacity of 1,600 tons, whereas its minimum requirement is 5,600 tons—a shortage of 4,000 tons after six months in the Army of the Nation which builds more automobiles than all the rest of the world.

Meanwhile $18,000,000 worth of automobiles have been ordered from Italy.

For this exhibit lack of shipping is made the excuse, yet Government-employed steamers, of 8,000 to 10,000 tons burden, have arrived from America at French ports with half their carrying capacity unfilled, or in some cases occupied by articles not needed at this time, as, for example, hospital beds, of which there are accumulated enough for real war. And all the while the Red Cross has been filling its warehouses from the same source as that of the Army, over the same waterway, in the same bottoms.

RED TAPE, LACK OF METHOD.

If there was any preliminary preparation for the reception of troops during the interval between our declaration of war and their arrival in France, it was negligible. The men were dumped into France, and, to a large extent, upon French hospitality, with no intelligent forethought of the needs in housing, provisioning, transportation, or reserves of supplies which a division or more requires.

When the Rainbow Division arrived "somewhere in France" five months after the First Division the men packed their first supplies into their camp on their backs.

Until the stimulating House recommendations came to bid us hope, we had advanced not a great way in the business of going to war beyond Cuban campaign days, when only a merciful Father held in check the storms that would have driven our supply ships to sea and left the men on shore with not another day's rations.

Then, as now, the causes were the same—red tape, lack of business men and business methods for a business job; the results were the same—all-round inefficiency, delay, confusion, breakdown in the supply service.

Had there been a really strong and determined foe opposing us in Cuba we would have paid heavily, indeed, before we reached Santiago.

The single marked advance in 1917 is in the Red Cross organization, which was almost useless, at least on the front, in 1898, but promises to lead the American expedition of 1917 in forehanded efficiency.

SUPPLIES AHEAD FOR FIVE DAYS ONLY.

Then we gave our volunteers—the Seventy-first New York and Second Massachusetts—black-powder cartridges to reveal their presence to a foe using smokeless cartridges, with a range three times as great; now we give our soldiers no machine guns—the most indispensable weapon of the war.

Then we managed to get one day's supplies ahead; now we have five, and 3,000 miles separating our base and our line.

Then, ammunition first to be needed was loaded into the bottom of the transport cargo while less important articles were placed ready at hand; now, sorely needed wagon bodies arrive in one ship and the wheels three weeks later on another steamer.

Then we left practically all our artillery at Tampa for a campaign in which it would have been a quickly decisive element; now we have none of our own to take.

Then, before San Juan we were short of ammunition, which only a heroic mule pack train managed to bring up in the night to the men who were digging in; now we are relying on France and England to supply our deficiencies.

In 1898 it was individual initiative, spirit, which inspired and enabled the men landed at Daiquiri to find and assemble their outfits from the bewildering confusion of dunnage on the beach, and to scramble forward to the first fight at Las Guasimas—of which the retreating Spanish colonel reported to his commander at Santiago, "They tried to catch us with their hands!"

But 1918 is not 1898, and the Boche is not the Spaniard, and American resourcefulness and initiative and spirit (for rifle marksmanship alone), splendidly abiding as they are, will not secure on the west front the easily won results they attained in Cuba and the Philippines. This is obvious, though apparently hidden from bureau discernment.

SENIORITY FETICH PLUS PREJUDICE.

As in 1898, we have been in the toils of the seniority fetich plus prejudice, and the two most important departments in the Army—Quartermaster and Ordnance—made the dumping ground for inertia, inexperience, and incapacity.

Our success or failure to do our part alongside our allies in the war for human rights, the very lives of our sons and brothers whom we have sent to battle, rest upon the Quartermaster's Department, upon the foresight and energy of its bureau heads, and the swift, unceasing operation of its transportation and supply service. There is no department in any army so important.

The feeding, the transportation, the equipping of a great army is a business job for men of wide vision and large business experience such as no army officer of a nonmilitary nation ever gets or ever could get under normal conditions. With the freedom of the world threatened by a foe who is powerful and ruthless and foul, there is not time "to teach an old dog new tricks." We have the same blundering, the same loss of time and effort as in 1898, but with this great difference, that in 1918 they may cost us opportunity and life. It is, then, but the commonest of common sense that the business end of an army be placed in the hands of business men—as Great Britain finally found it necessary to do—and that the best of the high-grade business brains with which the United States is plentifully supplied—and the choice of which the President may have for the asking—should direct its work. This is a case where reform is needed from the top down rather than from the bottom up, for there is much good, young timber in the Quartermaster's Department drawn from civil business life. The trouble is not in France; it is in America. We have translated the Washington circumlocution office to France; we have made the Quartermaster's department in France, which in subordinate places has some capable, energetic, and youngish men of business experience, an annex to Washington, with its crossroads grocery-store methods and its ancient and honorable personnel.

SHAMELESS STORY OF SUPPLY.

The sorry, shameless story of the machine gun is the story of the supply and transportation service in France to-day.

In August, 1916, Congress appropriated $12,000,000 especially and specifically for the purchase of machine guns, and placed the sum at the disposal of the Ordnance Department. But it was not until our first division was already in France, in June, 1917—10 months later—that the first steps were taken by the Chief of the Ordnance Department, Gen. Crozier—according to his own statement—to get the guns which three years of terrible carnage had demonstrated as being the most useful of all the arms for the soldier in the trench. With the world struggling for freedom through the hellfire of such battles and our entrance imminent, it is an amazing story, paralleled only by that of the months' wrangling in the Shipping Board over the respective merits of wood and iron at the cost of irremediable time, while the world's boats were being sunk daily and the world's food endangered.

We are somewhat in the position as to general officers that England was at her beginning, and we must do—and the House recommendations give encouragement that we shall begin to do—what England did, only we must not wait so long to do it, unless we want to subject our soldiers to a Gallipoli with its heroic, ghastly record, or a Neuvechapelle, where the British lost thousands and the chance for a distinct and much-needed victory.

PUT YOUNG MEN IN COMMAND.

France and England withdraw their officers too old for the new game—which is no criticism of these otherwise excellent men suited for posts where physical fitness and swift executive action are not so essential, if any such posts can be found in these days—and we shall be obliged to do the same if our Army is to have a chance to make good.

At a recent dinner to an American Congressman in a British sector there was not an officer over 45 years of age, and four brigadier generals under 36.

France is no place for officers who are too old to learn or too firmly fixed in their notions to do so. They should be brought home. As Gen. Sibert said in my presence, "It is an entirely new game, and it's up to us to learn it." "And to learn it damn quick!" exclaimed another more outspoken officer in the group. Some older officers scantily conceal disregard, if not contempt, for the opinions and the methods and the language of the French. Surely in the face of the dearly bought and complete experience of our allies the pretensions of comparative military upstarts is indefensible—and absurd.

Officers that have spent 20 to 40 years in a single-track bureau, who have grown old in a small army, with its local and simple antedated service, can not be expected to change suddenly a lifetime's habit and method and expand to the precise and the entirely strange requirements of the new kind of warfare. It is downright unfair to subject them to such a trial, not to say ordeal; to the soldiers dependent upon them it is a hazard they should not be expected to accept.

CUT RED TAPE TO SPARE LIFE.

To learn this war game, exacting and scientific to a degree never dreamed of, demands men young and eager and at the mental and physical top of their capabilities.

"We have had to cut red tape to spare the lives of our poilus," said the war minister of France to me a few days ago. "England has done so, and America will find that she must also." Red tape is the unionism of the Government service; it is standardizing influence "going down," which throttles ability and levels all departmental effort to the lowest instead of the highest standard of efficiency; and for the red tape which stultifies normal intelligence, commend me to the brand which tradition in the army has imposed upon the medical service, where medical reports can reach medical headquarters for action only after making the long, slow passage through the line—that is, from commanding officer of the regiment to commanding officer of the brigade, then to the division, then to headquarters, and thence to medical headquarters. By illustration, I cite one case where it took two and one-half months—not days or weeks, but months—for the report of a medical officer, a colonel and the ranking medical officer in France at the time, to arrive at medical headquarters.

As this urgent report, with its constructive suggestions, dragged its tortuous way toward headquarters the soldiers it concerned were without proper housing and clothing, and a number of suicides from homesickness and depression resulted.

England had the same efficiency-destroying system at the beginning of the war, but soon was forced to change for the good of her men. The Italians in their Labyan campaign suffered under a similar method and promptly saw the wisdom of abolishing it in order to conserve an excellent condition of mind and body in their soldiers. To-day in the British, French, and Italian armies medical reports go through medical officers to medical headquarters, and no line officer can delay or stop them.

We should have profited by their experience, but as in other directions we haven't. Our medical men have all the responsibility and no authority. Shall we wait to cut this strangling bit of red tape until the bodies of our dead mount to scandalous proportions?

TRUTH THAT ACHES.

Secrecy between a people and their government is a mischievous element in national life. Lloyd-George told England in one of his stirring speeches not very long ago that a nation which is not virile enough to bear the truth about itself is not a first-class power.

In America, as in England, the people are entitled to the truth, even though it be ugly and uncomplimentary, even though it fall on devoted theories or heads or prejudices. In America, as in England, we need to look uncolored facts in the face. This is a moment for us to hear such truth. I believe we can hear it, though Germany is banking on our not being big enough and strong enough to tell the truth to ourselves. Germany says we are not a first-rate power; that we are so saturated with greed and materialism that we can not rise to this our great occasion. And none of us can be sure that we shall; none of us can say if, indeed, we have found our national soul, if ours is the national spirit that will pay, and endure and pay again. We have shown our greatness in material things, but material things alone do not measure a nation's greatness—there is the moral fiber without which the measure is but half reckoned. We are on trial before the world.

FRANCE MUST MUNITION US.

Nine months ago we entered the war. To-day we are giving no land aid to our allies in a military sense, while we are drawing on them for our equipment essentials, of which they have no surplus to spare us easily.

Talking with French officers on this subject, I asked if they could spare the guns and ammunition and gasoline they were giving us. They answered: "What will you? You must have them; your Army has none; we must let you have them so long as we possibly can; we do our best; it is reducing our reserves; we have no ample surplus; we hope you will quickly be able to bring your own supplies."

We have made high promises, there has been large talk of our potentialities, but our actual showing thus far is incompetence in the outfitting and purchasing and forwarding departments of our quartermaster; and wrangling, red tape, and disorganization, which are responsible for our present inability to furnish our soldiers with machine guns, rifles, ammunition, ordnance, and suitable clothing.

It is a lamentable breakdown and the cause of much disquiet in France, not only for its disappointment in our widely heralded efficiency, but for the further sacrifices it suggests as likely to cost her.

It is not too much to say that our failure to equal our allies' natural expectations of this great, wealthy, industrial Nation is answerable for the grave situation which makes the coming six months as critical as the first six months of the war.

VISION! VISION!

It isn't merely that there have been blunders; blunders we would and do expect as the inevitable accompaniment of an unmilitary democracy going to war; but it is the absence of an appreciation of the necessities of the hour by the responsible heads of bureaus; the failure to grasp the demands of this kind of a war game; the narrow vision; the strangling red tape; the fact that a condition could exist where such a delay at such a time as in the matter of the machine guns and rifles would be possible.

Thus far we have taken little profit from British and French experience. With ample warning and time for preparation, with unlimited manufacturing facilities, untold wealth and the models and counsel of Great Britain and France to guide us, we should have put our men afield with the very best possible equipment, instead of which we have sent them to trials of body and spirit, of endurance and patient courage such as men never have met before this war—with an equipment in some respects the least practical, the least comfortable and serviceable.

The efficiency and organization upon which we plumed ourselves and for which the world took us at our word have been conspicuously absent so far as the proper equipment and maintenance of our little Army in France is concerned.

We are in danger of receiving a crushing blow to our material and spiritual well-being unless we come promptly out of all dreams of immunity from a victorious Germany, and awake to a realization of what this war means to us, to you and me, to our business and our homes.

MUST WE BE SHAMED?

Germany says we can't.

We have voted great sums for the war and made huge programs, but not yet as a people have we risen above selfish individualistic ambitions for comfort or power or profit. Democracy, narrowly viewed, makes for individualistic development for individualistic rewards. It is for us now in the face of menace and the call of our allies in our ears to show if we can merge the individual into united effort for the State and for the cause on which hangs the fate of the very democracy by which we live and prosper.

We must prove big enough to rise to this need, else we shall be too late next spring in France, and so justify Germany's estimate of us.

Some of us, through the press, are still patting ourselves on the back over what "we have done," but it behooves us to be modest before the great deeds, under greater handicaps than ours, of England and France and Canada and Australia.

We have not organized ourselves as well as France did at her beginning; we have not shown the thorough workmanship of the British. Unprepared England two and one-half months after the declaration of war stopped the Huns at the Yser at great cost, but stopped them and saved Calais and probably the war. Unprepared America nine months after coming in and six months after reaching the front is still considering the problem of supplies and the line of communication.

"Slow" old England has beaten young America in speed, efficiency, organization!

INSIST ON REMEDIES.

That very shrewd student of human nature, M. Clemenceau, said the other day in response to the question whether he considered it wise that people should be taken into the confidence of Government: "I believe self-governing people fight better when they have full knowledge of the actual situation."

The American people, in full knowledge of the portent of this hour, must demand of their Congress and its appointed committees speedy fulfillment of the tasks intrusted to them by the people and their President.

A democratic government goes no faster and no further than the people who constitute the government insist. It is the temper of the civil population that propels or retards a great effort such as we are now called on to make. We get the kind of legislation, the kind of men in office that we want; they reflect accurately either our desires or our indifference—our neglects of citizen duty. If we have no machine guns and not enough rifles, and our troops are illy equipped, it is because the people have failed to demand them of the War Department. If there has been a breakdown in the supply and transportation service, it is because the people have not insisted that this most important department of an army keep pace in method and personnel with the scope of its duties. We have to confess these plain facts.

WHAT YOU MUST DO.

It is up to the people to recognize their failures and make now their demands:

That the seniority which keeps inefficiency in the Army and disloyalty in the Senate be effaced.

That Senators and Representatives abandon politics for patriotism and get behind the President.

That red tape be cut clear of the medical and all departments concerned in the prosecution of this war.

That top-heavy and ineffective committees be abolished or remodeled.

The people are behind their President, whose present attitude reveals an understanding of the character and the size of the task upon us, and whose well-chosen words breathe the spirit of a stalwart patriotism and a grim determination to fight through to a victorious and a just and lasting peace.

We must get on a war basis; we, the people, individually as well as collectively, must strip for war, else we shall fail.

And if we fail, sooner or later Germany will be in our ports.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McLEMORE].

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Chairman, I will devote the time accorded to me in reading a letter from a former Member of this House to a former Member of the United States Senate on the rights of the States and the relation of the States to the Federal Government. Or, if granted unanimous consent, I will merely extend my remarks in the RECORD and return the unexpired portion of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], who has granted it. And in order to save the time, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the letter referred to:

DECEMBER 18, 1917.

Hon. R. M. JOHNSTON,
Houston, Tex.

MY DEAR FRIEND: As you keep yourself informed about what has happened, as well as about what is apt to happen in Congress, I do not suppose you were much surprised when you read in the morning papers that on yesterday the House of Representatives by more than the necessary two-thirds vote approved the prohibition amendment to the Federal Constitution, but I am sure that you were very much surprised when you analyzed that vote and found that 141 Democrats had voted for it, while only 64 Democrats had voted against it. What a radical change that exhibits! Twenty years ago a man who favored national prohibition could not have been elected a delegate to a Democratic county convention from any precinct in the United States, and yet an overwhelming majority of the men now elected to Congress as Democrats voted yesterday for that proposition. But astounding as was the vote itself, it was not more astounding than the debate. Those who supported the amendment discussed it as if it merely presented the question of prohibition, and they spoke exactly as they could have properly spoken in the legislature of a State. I can not at this moment recall any discussion in Congress or outside of it which so thoroughly illustrates the strange confusion of political thought in this day, or which so strongly emphasizes the need of a recurrence to our first principles.

When the fathers were organizing this Republic they sought to create a General Government which would be strong enough to serve the purposes for which it was intended, and yet not so strong as to interfere with any proper function of the several States. According to that plan, they conferred on the General Government full power over our foreign relations, a limited power over our interstate relations, and left to each State the exclusive power to regulate its local affairs. There were some who doubted the wisdom of conferring all power with respect to our foreign relations on the General Government; but it was wisely determined that as all of the States would be held responsible for our conduct toward foreign nations, the Government representing all the States should possess the power to control that conduct. A large number doubted the wisdom of conferring upon the General Government any power over interstate relations; but upon consideration they became convinced that if every State was left to decide for itself a question concerning it and another State, each would decide that question according to its own interest or passions, thus inevitably resulting in unfriendly restrictions, if not in open collisions; and to obviate that, a very large majority agreed to the arrangement as it had been proposed. A still larger number, including all of the extreme Federalists, objected to leaving the States with such vast powers, expressing the fear that they would in time impair the efficiency of the General Government; but the convention, by a very decisive majority, overruled their objection, and the Government was established with that distribution of its powers. It had hardly been inaugurated, however, when the advocates of centralization began a systematic effort to reduce, by construction and administration, the powers of the States and to correspondingly enlarge the powers of the United States. That effort was resisted, and out of the conflict of opinion thus precipitated the Democratic Party was born.

If there has been one article of our creed to which we have adhered more steadfastly than to all others since Thomas Jefferson first founded our party, it has been the doctrine of State rights, and if there was ever a time when a strict adherence to that doctrine was more necessary than at all other times, it is now, when the General Government has already encroached upon the States to an extent which must alarm every thoughtful Democrat. With the Federal Department of Justice prosecuting our citizens for conspiracy against the United States, as in the Nueces County case, when there was not the shadow of an excuse for that prosecution; with the Supreme Court of the United States practically nullifying the power of the States to regulate commerce wholly within them, as it did in the Shreveport rate case; with Congress usurping control over children in the States, as it did in the child-labor law; and remembering that these are but examples of the steady, persistent, and numerous encroachments, it would seem that Democratic Congressmen would understand the necessity of opposing the further extension of Federal power.

The men who have been most potential in forcing this amendment through Congress perfectly understand that Federal prohibition is utterly inconsistent with the democratic theory of State rights, and they have boldly repudiated that theory. Ex-Gov. Patterson, who, though a recent convert to prohibition, is now one of its ablest advocates, has given out within the last three days an interview which goes far beyond anything which Alexander Hamilton ever ventured to say in favor of centralizing all power in the General Government. The ex-governor of Tennessee, unlike some of those who follow his lead, does not hesitate to follow his own logic, and this is, in part, what he said:

"While I am a southern man, I am in favor of greater unity in this country—the building up of a Nation with national spirit and policies. I haven't any patience with those persons who are constantly shouting about State rights. If one wants something, he is for State rights; if he doesn't want anything, he is against State rights. What we want is a more united Nation, with State lines eliminated except for a few purposes."

Doubtless some of those who voted for the prohibition amendment will disclaim all sympathy with that utterance of ex-Gov. Patterson, but we must judge them by their acts rather than by their words. What right has any man to claim that he is opposed to "the elimination of State lines," while he is voting directly to eliminate them? Perhaps many of those who voted for that amendment did so against their own convictions, and really believe in the right of every State to control its purely internal affairs; but very few of them will ever have the moral courage to confess the error of that vote and return to their former advocacy of State rights. There is a law of political gravitation just as certainly as there is a law of physical gravitation, and men who once enter upon a given course are driven irresistibly to continue in that course. The vote for that Federal prohibition amendment may have been their first step, but with many of them it will be an irretraceable step toward the "elimination of State lines."

No Democrat can justify himself in voting to transfer any police power of the States to the General Government, and least of all can he justify a transfer of the power to permit or prohibit the sale of liquor, because the exercise of that power by one State can not possibly affect the people of any other State. If Texas chooses to permit the sale of liquors, Kansas has no right to say we shall not do so, because the sale of liquor in Texas can not disturb the peace or injure the health or corrupt the morals of Kansas. Whether or not a State will permit or prohibit the sale of liquor is a question which each State should be left to decide for itself, because the people of each State alone are affected by that decision; and I would no more agree that New York shall have the right to say we must permit the sale of liquor, if we desire to prohibit it, than I would agree for Kansas to say that we shall prohibit the sale of liquor, if we desire to permit it. For more than a century these have been received as axioms of democracy, and why shall we reject them now?

If the evils of the liquor traffic were increasing, I could understand that good men might conclude that the methods by which we have heretofore dealt with it are insufficient and might insist upon new and more drastic methods. But that is not the case. You know, and every other intelligent man in this country knows, that there has never been an hour in the history of this country when the evils of the liquor traffic were less than they are to-day, and we also know that those evils have been constantly diminishing through many years. When I first became a legal voter there was a saloon on almost every good corner of every city, town, and village in this land, and in the very midst of them we reared a race of the bravest men and the purest women which any age or country has yet produced. I do not, of course, mean to say that those saloons stimulated the courage of our men or cultivated the virtue of our women; nor do I doubt that we would have been better off without them. But I do say, in the light of that experience, that it is worse than folly for these extremists to tell us that we should destroy these States in order to destroy the saloons. If it were necessary to do the one in order to do the other, I would still refuse, because to do that would be as foolish as it would be for a farmer to burn his barn in order to drive away the vermin. I know we can live and prosper; that we can extend the influence of religion and multiply the blessings of education; that we can even advance the cause of temperance and improve the public morals in spite of the saloons, because our fathers did all of that and more; but we can not save this Republic if we abandon the principles on which it was founded.

But, happily, we are not compelled to choose between continuing the saloon and destroying the States. For 30 years the people of the various States, without surrendering any power which belongs to them, have been gradually banishing the saloon, until eight-tenths of them have disappeared. Thirty years ago the drink habit was very common among our people, and it was often indulged to an excess by men who stood high in business, financial, and political life. But this also has changed, and we now rarely see a reputable man, either rich or poor, intoxicated on the public streets. Different men offer different explanations of this remarkable improvement. Some say that it has been wrought out through prohibition laws, State and local, while others say that it is due to the fact that men have come to realize that intemperance is injurious to them physically and financially as well as morally. But whatever may be the correct explanation, the fact itself is undisputed, and it is impossible for me to understand how any Democrat can deem it necessary to abandon a system under which such a result has been achieved and violate one of the very basic principles of our party in order to deal with a diminishing evil.

Besides the conditions to which I have above referred, and which of themselves should be sufficient to satisfy every reasonable man with the progress we have made, and with the system under which we have made it, recent legislation has removed an argument which was formerly employed with no little effect by the advocates of national prohibition. For years those who have been most active in the Federal prohibition movement have insisted that the commerce power of the United States constantly interfered with the police power of the States and rendered State prohibition laws ineffective. In response to that argument, Congress enacted what is known as the Webb-Kenyon law, by which it abdicated whatever power it possessed in that respect in favor of the States. That law was challenged in the courts and its constitutionality has been sustained. Nor is this all. Less than 10 days ago the Supreme Court of the United States delivered an opinion in a case which came to that tribunal from the State of Idaho, by which the power of the State was made still more plenary. Indeed, taking the Webb-Kenyon law itself, the opinion of the court sustaining its constitutionality, and adding to them the decision in the Idaho case, the power of every State in this Union over the manufacture and sale of liquor is as absolute now as human laws can make it. Why, then, do these people insist upon national prohibition? There is but one answer to that question, and that answer is that they intend to suppress, by Federal agency, the manufacture and sale of liquor in States which do not desire the suppression of it. In other words, and in plain words, these men are stripping these States of a vital police power simply because some of the States will not exercise that power as these misguided reformers desire.

If this prohibition amendment becomes a part of the Federal Constitution we might as well abandon all hope of preserving the rights of these States, for it will be followed by others of its kind. Next will come a national woman suffrage amendment, and after that will come an amendment authorizing Congress to establish uniform laws of marriage and divorce. This last amendment is already being urged by many of the same people who have promoted the prohibition and the woman suffrage amendments, and when it is adopted—as it will be in time, if the prohibition and the suffrage amendments are ratified—there will not be a square foot of territory in the United States where it will be unlawful for negroes and white people to intermarry. Then will come a proposal for a constitutional amendment authorizing Congress to regulate the distribution of estates where decedents leave property in several States. These same people are even now asking why property belonging to the same man should descend differently because it happens to be situated in different States, and why a will, valid in the State where the maker resides, should be insufficient to pass the title to real property in another State. Thus year after year the proponents of uniformity will continue their propaganda, until finally what were once sovereign States will be reduced to a condition where they will hardly enjoy the rights of conquered provinces.

Shall we stand idly by and witness, without an effort to prevent it, the utter subversion of this Republic? I sincerely hope not. The duty of the real Democrats of Texas is a plain one and an imperative one. We must organize to defeat the ratification of this amendment by our State, and we must at the same time make a supreme effort to rescue our party from the control of men who either do not understand or else do not cherish its fundamental principles. To some of the Texans who voted for that amendment I am sincerely attached, and I would divide with them my last dollar or my last crust of bread; but I will not give my vote to any man who gives his vote to deprive these States of the right to control their own domestic concerns.

If the Democratic Party is to survive in anything more than in the name, it must be something more than an organized effort to obtain the offices, and it must firmly insist that those who seek its favor shall maintain its principles. Politics must be something more than a matter of mere personal preference or personal prejudice. Good government is too vital to the freedom and happiness of our people to be sacrificed to personal friendships or personal ambitions. I am willing to accord the fullest measure of respect to a good man; but I am only willing to give my vote to a good Democrat; because I believe—and I believe it as devoutly as any Christian believes in his religion—that the destruction of this Government must inevitably follow an abandonment of democratic principles.

Mistakes of policy, the consequences of which we may measure in dollars and cents, may be tolerated; but a sacrifice of the very basic principles of the Republic is in politics what blasphemy of the Holy Ghost is in religion—an unpardonable sin. We can repair mistakes, even though they be grievous ones, if they relate only to property or to property rights; but a mistake which alters the very form and structure of this Government can never be repaired, and it ought not, therefore, to be forgiven.

Surely those of us who believe that the very existence of this Government as it was organized by our patriotic fathers is imperiled will not be less ready for this contest than those who are proposing a dangerous innovation; and I am eager to enlist under the leadership of any man who has the wisdom to expound and the courage to defend the genuine principles of democracy.

Very truly, your friend, J. W. BAILEY.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced bills to establish a department of munitions and a department of war supplies, with secretaries and subordinates, and defining the province and duty of each of such departments.

I contemplated also introducing a bill to establish a department of war transportation, and should have done so but for the President's action in taking over the railroads and appointing a director. However, I am of the opinion a department of transportation should be established at the earliest practicable moment.

There are at present 10 executive departments of the Government, the Secretaries of which constitute the President's Cabinet. In the order of their creation they are State, Treasury, War, Justice, Post Office, Navy, Interior, Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor.

In 1789 the first Congress under the new Government among its earliest acts created three executive departments. July 27 an act was passed entitled "An act for establishing an executive department to be denominated the department of foreign affairs." It also provided for the appointment of a "secretary for the department of foreign affairs." The act committed to the department charge, under the President, of "correspondence, commissions, or instructions to or with ministers and consuls of the United States, and to negotiate with ministers from foreign States respecting foreign affairs."

By a subsequent act of the same year the name of the department was changed to the Department of State.

Thomas Jefferson was appointed by President Washington, and thus became our first Secretary of State.

In September of the same year an act was passed creating a Department of the Treasury and providing for a Secretary. His duties were, in part, to "digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue and for the support of the public credit; to prepare and report estimates of the public revenue and the public expenditures; to superintend the collection of the revenue," and so forth.

The first Secretary was Alexander Hamilton, of New York.

In the same year an act was passed creating the Department of War and providing for a Secretary. To this department was committed charge of "all matters relative to military commissions, of land and naval forces, of ships or warlike stores of the United States." It will be seen that at first this Department had superintendence and control of both the Army and the Navy.

President Washington appointed his personal friend and comrade in arms, Gen. Henry Knox, of Massachusetts, as Secretary.

In the judicial act of September 24, 1789, there was contained a provision for the appointment of a "meet person, learned in the law, to act as Attorney General for the United States, whose duty it shall be to prosecute and conduct all suits in the Supreme Court in which the United States may be concerned and to give his advice and opinion upon questions of law where required by the President or where requested by the heads of any of the departments."

The Attorney General was thus made the legal adviser of the President and the heads of departments. This made him almost necessarily a member of the Cabinet, although he had no legal recognition as such until 1878, when he was made head of the Department of Justice.

Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, was appointed our first Attorney General.

In 1798, on the eve of a probable war with France, an act was passed for the creation of a separate executive department to be known as the Department of the Navy. The imminence of war with France, the necessity for the immediate enlargement and strengthening of the Navy which had almost disappeared, and the fact that in war the Secretary of War would have all that could be expected of one man in the superintendence and control of the Army were sufficient reasons for the creation of the new department.

President Adams appointed Benjamin Stoddert, of Maryland, first Secretary of the Navy.

In 1789 Congress passed an act providing for the temporary establishment of a Post Office, and Washington appointed Samuel Osgood as Postmaster General. The Postmaster General was not recognized as a member of the President's Cabinet until during the administration of Andrew Jackson, and the department as such was not created and its province and duties defined until during Grant's administration.

In 1849 the Department of the Interior was created and a Secretary provided. The necessity for the creation of such a department was early recognized. Gov. Morris proposed a "Department of domestic affairs," Charles Pinckney proposed a "Department of home affairs," and other propositions of similar import were submitted from time to time. Clay and Webster among others urged the necessity of such a department. Under the leadership of Robert J. Walker, Secretary of the Treasury under President Polk, the act creating the department was finally passed.

Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, was our first Secretary of the Interior.

In 1889, a century after the first Cabinet officer was appointed, near the close of Mr. Cleveland's first term, the Department of Agriculture was created. What amounted in fact to a bureau was established and a Commissioner of Agriculture provided for in 1862. It was not made a real department of the Government and its chief was not made a Secretary and a member of the Cabinet until 1889.

Hon. Norman J. Coleman, of Missouri, was made first Secretary of Agriculture.

In 1903, during President Roosevelt's administration, the Department of Commerce and Labor was created. The Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Interior, and particularly the Secretary of the Treasury were relieved of parts of their burdens by the creation of the new department. To it were also committed many new administrative duties.

Mr. George B. Cortelyou, of New York, was appointed to the new secretaryship.

On the last day of President Taft's administration a bill was passed creating the Department of Labor and separating it from the Department of Commerce and Labor. The purpose of the new department, as stated in the act, is "to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, to improve their working conditions, and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment."

President Wilson appointed as first Secretary of this department Hon. William B. Wilson, who is still serving.

The necessity for a Cabinet has never been better stated than by Washington. In 1789, soon after assuming the Presidency, he wrote:

> The impossibility that one man should be able to perform all the great business of the State I take to have been the reason for instituting the great departments and appointing officers therein to assist the Supreme Magistrate in discharging the duties of his trust.

It is an interesting fact that we had a Cabinet before we had a President. During the Revolutionary period, before the adoption of the Constitution, heads of departments were selected and the administrative functions of the Government carried on without a Chief Executive. To two of these, Robert Morris, "Superintendent of Finance," and John Jay, "Secretary of Foreign Affairs," the country owes a lasting debt of gratitude. It seems now as if it would have been impossible to have gone through that critical period without their transcendent ability and consummate tact, as well as their devoted patriotism.

Under our system of government the Cabinet has a peculiar constitutional status. In terms the Cabinet is not provided for and its duties are not defined. Yet it is recognized as an essential part of our form of government and it has at least constitutional sanction. The Constitution makes reference to the "principal officer in each of the executive departments." Again, referring to the "heads of departments," it is provided that the President may require their opinion "in writing" upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices. The Constitution also gives Congress power to vest in the "heads of departments" the power to appoint certain officers of the Government.

These references in the Constitution clearly indicate that a Cabinet was contemplated and considered essential. It would also seem that it was understood that these heads of departments were to be created by Congress from time to time as occasion should justify.

Under the American system members of the Cabinet have two lines of duty—the one prescribed by law, the other dependent entirely upon the President's wishes. As the head of a department, the Cabinet officer has certain prescribed administrative duties which are enumerated in the act of Congress which creates the department. As an adviser of the President, he is required to act only when the President so desires.

We have derived our Cabinet from the English Cabinet, but there are vital differences between the two systems. The English Cabinet assumes and exercises supreme direction of both legislation and administration. As representative of the Crown it exercises supreme executive power, and as representative of Parliament it exercises supreme legislative authority.

This is in violation of the American constitutional principle of the separation of the powers. In the United States the Cabinet is purely executive. It has no legislative function and little legislative influence. In Great Britain members of the Cabinet are legislators and have places on the floor of Parliament. In the United States Cabinet officers have no place on the floor of Congress, and even their presence is resented as an unjustifiable encroachment on the independence of the Legislature.

In Great Britain the Cabinet is responsible alone to Parliament. In the United States the Cabinet is alone responsible to the President. In Great Britain the Cabinet goes out with Parliament. In the United States the Cabinet goes out with the President. In Great Britain the Cabinet proposes and controls legislation. In the United States the Cabinet makes estimates for appropriations and requests for legislation through the President. In Great Britain the Cabinet is the dominant power in the State. In the United States it holds no such place. Practical necessity, however, vests in the heads of department a large measure of authority and responsibility. The President and Cabinet together constitute what is known as "the administration." The President is master and is given credit for the success of the administration or is held responsible for its failure.

The duties of Cabinet officers are thus principally and primarily administrative. They are the heads of the working powers of the Government. To an extent not found in any other country in the world are the functions and duties of Cabinet officers in the United States administrative. There is among members of our Cabinet no joint policy, no collective responsibility. Each Cabinet officer is given by law certain prescribed administrative duties, for the faithful performance of which he is responsible to the President. From time to time as the administrative duties of the Nation increase in variety and volume, whether by reason of natural growth and normal development or by sudden exigency, it is the duty of Congress to enlarge the Cabinet to meet the increased demands.

We have found that the duties of Cabinet officers are principally administrative and that the growth of the Nation and the extension of its governmental activities have in the past called into existence new departments of the Government as they were needed. We come now to consider the question whether conditions now exist which justify or require the creation of one or more additional departments to meet the demands of the present hour. It is my contention that the exigency caused by our participation in the present war demands the addition of one or more executive departments of the Government. The immense increase, the unprecedented nature, and the supreme importance of our war activities necessitate such action in order to secure dispatch and efficiency in the preparation and support of our Army and Navy for active service. Never before in the history of the world have been the requirements of speedy and adequate preparation so imperative upon any nation as are upon the United States at this time. The events of the war have so culminated in a crisis that unless we shall be able to render speedy assistance to our allies, and determinative service in the great struggle which now hangs trembling in the balance, victory will almost certainly go to our enemies. Such a calamity as this would be has never befallen the world in all the ages which have passed. In such appalling disaster would fall not only the entire fabric of our constitutional structure, but also the hope of mankind and the civilization of the world. Such is our responsibility, and such the call that comes to us from our own people and from all the liberty-loving people now engaged in the great death struggle across the seas.

There has been a large increase of activities in all of the departments of the Government occasioned by the war, but the principal increases have been in the Department of War and in the Navy Department.

In the Department of War the Army has already been increased from 9,524 officers on April 1, 1917, to 110,856 on January 1, 1918; and from 202,510 to 1,428,650 enlisted men. It is expected to increase the Army within the year to over 2,000,000 men.

For the fiscal year of 1915 Congress appropriated for the War Department $158,000,000. For the present fiscal year the appropriations are $7,527,338,716. Now, the appropriations are fifty times greater than under normal conditions. The appropriations for the War Department alone are more than seven times the total appropriations for the whole Government before the war.

Before the war the Ordnance Bureau consisted of 97 officers and about 2,000 men. It now consists of 3,004 officers and 26,120 men. It will expend $3,200,000,000 this year. All this immense sum must be expended on specified objects, on great and small contracts with producing and manufacturing concerns, on carrying on Government arsenals, producing arms and ammunition; on the increase of existing plants and the construction of new ones; on tests of guns and ammunition; on the inspection of articles delivered on contract; on the transportation of articles to their destination within this country or across the seas, and the hundreds of other activities that can not even be listed.

The Quartermaster's Bureau on April 1, 1917, had 347 officers. It now has 6,431, and will expend this year $3,018,000,000. Its activities embrace accounting in every branch of the service; determination of standards for food, clothing, and all other supplies; fixing prices and amounts and terms and places of delivery; creating new manufacturing facilities and engaging existing concerns; making contracts, erecting storage warehouses, arranging for transportation, and numerous other duties. Three hundred mills were employed in making clothing; 19,000,000 blankets, 20,000,000 yards of overcoating, 30,000,000 yards of suiting cloth, 52,000,000 pairs stockings have already been purchased. Over 4,650 contracts and at least partial deliveries have been made.

These statements regarding only two of the bureaus of the War Department give some idea of the tremendous increases made. Other increases might be shown. The Aviation Section has increased from 65 officers and 1,120 men to 3,900 officers and 82,120 men. The appropriations for this year were $744,000,000, or five times the amount appropriated for the whole War Department before the war.

In the Navy Department a like growth and expansion of activities has taken place. In his annual report Paymaster General McGowan says, "When the war of 1917 became imminent the pressure on the supply department at first doubled, then trebled, and in some cases increased many times over. Double shifts, treble shifts, and additional officers and employees—all working overtime—have, however, kept the work up to date." Again he says, "Leave has had to be practically abandoned, while for months the entire force worked overtime every day, to say nothing of the overtime work in addition, by everybody in a position of responsibility. Officers, civilians, and reservists worked with an enthusiasm truly admirable and results most gratifying."

Praise is certainly due many of the officers in the departments, and particularly in the Navy Department, for the extreme and able efforts they have made to meet the emergency. Individual instances of self-sacrificing devotion are many, and in some cases the results accomplished have been remarkable. Still success in meeting the demands of the occasion, particularly in the War Department, has been far from satisfactory.

If I am accorded the opportunity I hope soon to call attention specifically to some of the obstacles that prevent a mere enlargement of the present departments from successfully meeting the emergency. At present I desire only to emphasize, if I may, what I consider the advantage of creating new Cabinet positions to meet the tremendous increase of governmental activities and to show that it is perfectly consistent and expedient that we should do so. It is almost certain that action must speedily be taken to separate the purchasing and purely business activities of the Government from the military departments, and to consolidate such power in the hands of one man, either as the head of a new department, with a place in the Cabinet, or as chief of an independent department. This head or chief must be given power to coordinate and unify the purely business part of the immense undertaking of successfully carrying on this war. It is my belief that this can best be done by creating responsible heads of departments, with recognized authority and powers commensurate with the demands.

Early Great Britain learned the lesson that it was necessary to separate the business administration of carrying on the war from the military and naval departments. Early it saw that the immensity of the undertaking called for the united powers of the nation. Within nine months after the commencement of the war it reorganized its entire cabinet and installed a new coalition cabinet made up of the leading men of all the parties.

It did not ask unquestioning support from the membership of all parties without at the same time according fair recognition of such support. The liberal party, then in power, did not assume that it contained all the wisdom and all the patriotism of the country, and so it gave recognition where recognition was due. In this manner the best service from all the parties was drawn to the support of the Government.

Our Cabinet contains at present but 10 places, the present English Cabinet contains 38. Since the war began several new places have been created. Among these are a minister of munitions, minister of blockade, minister of food control, director general of national service, president of the air ministry, shipping controller, and minister of pensions. It would not appear in view of such action that a proposal to add three to our present Cabinet who should be given such places because of the present extraordinary demands, and who should hold such places only during the present emergency, was a very revolutionary proceeding.

The most important of the new places created in the English Cabinet during the war is the minister of munitions. To fill this place Mr. Lloyd-George, the present prime minister, was taken from the position of chancellor of the exchequer. It was to his splendid ability and indefatigable energy that the wonderful success in organizing the industrial activities of Great Britain for the support of the war was due. It was his marvelous success as minister of munitions that elevated him to his present place as head of the nation and the dominant figure among the nations opposing the Germans.

It may be of interest to set out here the act by which the ministry of munitions was created.

By the act of Parliament, dated June 9, 1915, it is enacted:

1. (1) For the purpose of supplying munitions for the present war, it shall be lawful for His Majesty to appoint a minister of munitions, who shall hold office during His Majesty's pleasure.

(2) The minister of munitions may appoint such secretaries, officers, and servants as the minister may determine.

2. (1) The minister of munitions shall have such administrative powers and duties in relation to the supply of munitions for the present war as may be conferred upon him by His Majesty in council, and His Majesty may also, if he considers it expedient that, in connection with the supply of munitions, any powers or duties of a government department or authority, whether conferred by statute or otherwise, should be transferred to, or exercised or performed concurrently by, the minister of munitions, by order in council make the necessary provision for the purpose, and any order made in pursuance of this section may include any supplemental provisions which appear necessary for the purpose of giving full effect to the order.

BRITISH MINISTRY OF MUNITIONS.

Under the defense-of-the-realm act, the minister of munitions has the power:

(a) To require that there shall be placed at their disposal the whole or any part of the output of any factory or workshop of whatever sort or the plant thereof.

(b) To take possession of and use for the purpose of His Majesty's naval or military service any factory or workshop or any plant thereof.

(c) To require any work in any factory or workshop to be done in accordance with the directions of the Admiralty or army council or the minister of munitions, given with the object of making the factory or workshop, or the plant or labor therein, as useful as possible for the production of war material; and

(d) To regulate or restrict the carrying on of any work in any factory, workshop, or other premises, or the engagement or employment of any workmen or all or any class of workmen therein, or to remove the plant therefrom, with a view to maintaining or increasing the production of munitions in other factories, workshops, or premises, or to regulate and control the supply of metals and materials that may be required for any article for use in war; and

(e) To take possession of any unoccupied premises for the purpose of housing workmen employed in the production, storage, or transport of war material; and regulations under this act may be made accordingly.

It is hereby declared that where the fulfillment by any person of any contract is interfered with by the necessity on the part of himself or any other person of complying with any requirement, regulation, or restriction of the Admiralty or army council or the minister of munitions or the food controller under this act, or any regulations made thereunder, that necessity is a good defense to any action or proceedings taken against that person in respect of the nonfulfillment of the contract so far as it is due to that interference.

In this subsection the expression "war material," includes arms, ammunition, warlike stores and equipment, and everything required for or in connection with the production thereof.

Under the various acts which have been passed the minister of munitions has the power to sign contracts and supervise their execution, to operate mines and industrial plants, to regulate the order in which work shall be done, to establish conditions under which labor shall be employed, to regulate hours and wages, to limit the profits on the operation of certain plants, to fix the price of materials and finished products, to limit the use which may be made of materials, and to take possession of stocks of materials in the country. The decisions of the minister are mandatory, and failure to obey his instructions is punishable by fine and imprisonment.

It is not expected that we should give the proposed secretary of munitions for this country such extensive powers. Some of those given the English minister we have already committed to others. But we should give to such place all the power necessary to secure expedition and efficiency. The occupant of such place should be made the dominant figure under the President in our war preparations.

The supreme direction of the military and naval policy of Great Britain is now placed in the hands of the war cabinet, which took the place of the advisory committee of imperial defense. The new war cabinet consists of five persons, the Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd-George; the Earl of Curzon; Mr. A. Bonar Law; Lord Milner; and Mr. Arthur Henderson. It is interesting to note that the present war cabinet is composed entirely of civilians, while the old advisory committee of imperial defense included the first lord of the Admiralty, the first sea lord of the Admiralty, the chief of imperial general staff, the director of naval intelligence, and the director of military operations. If reluctance is felt in taking from the military and naval departments of our Government purely civil and business activities and placing them in the hands of civilians and business men, the action of Great Britain in taking all military and naval officers from the entire management of the war may be considered with profit.

The war cabinet of Great Britain is almost continuously in session. Sometimes three sessions daily are held. The Prime Minister is in constant consultation with his associates. A distinguished American having an appointment with him was compelled to wait three hours for the adjournment of a session.

It is needless to say that such energy and devotion to the prosecution of the war are what has placed Great Britain at the head of the defensive forces opposing the German Government.

If it should appear best that we should organize a war cabinet to which should be committed the conduct of the war, it should include the President, who is our prime minister, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the secretary of transportation, the secretary of munitions, and the secretary of war supplies. The secretary of transportation should have charge of all transportation both by land and sea. He should be given supervision and control of all the railroads, inland water transportation, and all ocean commerce. To the secretary of war supply should be given the securement of all food, clothing, and equipment for the soldiers other than munitions, and he should also be given the powers now exercised by the Food and Fuel Administrators. This would bring to us better service in all the war activities, and the correlation of all the industrial and productive powers in carrying on of the war. Still more important and necessary, it would give us plan and purpose, unity of effort, and that energy and vigor which at present seems to be sadly lacking.

The effort that has been made to accomplish these results by the creation of independent commissions, carried on by volunteers who serve without pay and are without responsibility or authority was certain of failure. If the ordinary work of the Government should not be carried on in this way, the work upon the success of which the very existence of the Nation depends should not.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. EMERSON. Why can not all of this be accomplished by the President himself? If he wants efficiency in the war, why should not he issue orders?

Mr. TOWNER. The President could create new and independent departments for carrying on the war under the war powers committed to him by Congress. This he has done with the railroads, placing them under the control of a director. But Congress has conferred certain powers upon the War and Navy Departments of which they can not be divested without the further action of Congress. Besides, as I have endeavored to show, it is better and safer to confer such great powers upon an officer the dignity of whose place shall be commensurate with the magnitude of the duties assigned to him and whose authority will be clear and unquestioned. For this reason I think the control of munitions should be given to a secretary of munitions rather than to a director of munitions.

Mr. EMERSON. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, if we create this secretary of munitions the President will appoint him?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. EMERSON. And he would be some partisan friend of the President, would he not?

Mr. TOWNER. It would be unfair to assume that such would be done. It would be fair to assume that the President would appoint the best man for the place that could be found, whether he was a partisan friend of the President or not. Only thus can this war be successfully carried on. We must in this great emergency bring to the service of the Nation the greatest talent and the most eminent abilty that can be found regardless of party affiliation. I would be lacking in candor if I should suggest that the President be given authority which I believe he would use for an unpatriotic purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the whole country is astounded on account of the order issued this morning, or announced this morning, providing for the closing of certain factories and places of amusement on certain days during the next two or three months of time. I am without information as to the necessity for this order. The country is without information up to the present moment. If the investigation now in progress at the other end of this building discloses the necessity for an order of this kind, it ought to be obeyed absolutely and strictly. If the investigation shows the necessity for this order, then here within the boundaries of continental United States we are fighting the first battle of this war, and it is the duty of every loyal American citizen to adjust himself to the changed conditions in which we find ourselves at the present time. There are 7,000 coal mines in the United States, in which 700,000 men work all day long and all night long bringing to the surface the coal, producing in this great basic industry what we must have in order to continue as a great manufacturing Nation in the world. Enough coal lies under the surface within the coal States of this country to last for four or five hundred years, and perhaps longer than that. Those of us who have been observant as to conditions presented in the last month or so know this; we know that we are producing now more coal than we ever produced before in all our history as a Nation. We know we produced in 1917, 675,000,000 tons of coal in the United States, 25 per cent more than we produced in 1915, 10 per cent more than we produced in 1916. This great industry has rallied, as all industries of this country, to the demand placed upon it by war. Increased price of coal? Why, of course, the price of coal has increased. Coal has increased in price the world over. Five dollars a ton and more than that for coal? Why, in the neutral country of Sweden coal, no better than this, is selling to-day for $90 a ton. Every character of production has increased in cost to the consumer, and notwithstanding the increase in the price of coal to the consumer, we are to-day selling coal far cheaper here in this country than it is sold in any other civilized nation, whether they are engaged in this war or not, the world round. I am not ready to criticize, unless I have abundant information and reason for it, any executive official of this Government. It is my duty, as I conceive it, to remain silent upon this question until the evidence shows the official ought to be criticized, and if he ought to be criticized he ought to be criticized mercilessly and without showing any kind of pity.

The railroads of this country have heretofore responded to the demands made upon them. We entered upon the period of this war with the railroads operating on the same gauge that the first railroad ever constructed in the United States was operated upon. We entered the war with the railroad system unchanged as to its competitive methods since the first years of railroad construction. We found that under this competitive system railroads, trying for freight, railroads carrying freight, were carrying the increased amounts all toward one great port, the port at which they expected the ships to land; and back from the wharves in New York City, back even to the mountains and beyond the mountains, extended the greatest freight congestion that we had ever known in this country.

And this Government rose to the emergency. Under legislation passed by a nonpartisan vote in this House the President took charge of the railroads and appointed to manage them a member of his Cabinet who in great executive positions had demonstrated that he was able to discharge those new and complicated duties. At once the skies began to clear, at once the terminals began to discharge their congested freight, until out of the north there came this storm and this biting cold, unparalleled in the history, almost, of the country, extending this freezing weather over every acre of ground in continental United States. Without a parallel in our history, coming just at a time when empty boats were waiting their freight in the great ocean harbors of this country. The railroads had rallied to the demands upon them; every freight car until this congestion came was doing the work of two; our factories across the land were working in three shifts, night and day; and from a hundred thousand factories, responding to the mobilization demands of this country, lighted windows flashed back a greeting to the midnight express as it speeded across this continent, and all this called for more and always more coal.

There has been no lack of organization. There has been no lack of achievement. The demands upon the railroads and upon all our industries have been greater than ever before in our history as a nation, and the demands will be greater as the months pass. To-day, down here at Norfolk, there are long lines of cars——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. RAINEY. Down here at Norfolk there are scores of cars loaded with coal. Why were they not unloaded? It is apparent to any man who thinks for one moment. They are not unloaded because the rain and the snow have permeated the coal carried in those open cars, and, I am advised, you can not unload them. You can not unload those freight cars to-day with dynamite. What is the situation in this country? Harbors congested? Why, for the first time within the memory of men now living, Chesapeake Bay is frozen up from the mouth to the great harbors reached by the ocean-going craft, and they can not get in and can not get out.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I was just wondering why these cars could not be unloaded. I have noticed in a number of places where they turn steam on the coal in these cars and unload them in an hour.

Mr. RAINEY. I can not yield for a speech.

The harbors are frozen up. Men who have read the papers in the last two or three weeks know that to-day we have great battleships in the port of New York breaking the ice, making it possible to approach her great system of docks along her magnificent inland harbor. This has brought about this congestion of freight.

Now, if there is a coal shortage it is due to one of two things, namely, either the coal is not being produced or it is congested and does not move along our railroads. To-day the demands of manufacturing industries are greater than they have ever been. Our great cantonments—16 of them—are using enormous amounts of coal. We are using more coal than we ever used before, and this 25 per cent increase in production has not been able to overcome the fact that there is still a shortage in the coal supply of this country.

The way to meet these questions is not to meet them in a spirit of faultfinding. It is not to come here in this House upon insufficient evidence, and knock, and knock, and knock. The knockers are not accomplishing anything in this country in winning this war. It is the millions of men who are doing things; not the insignificant minority who are simply finding fault.

This is a serious proposition, indeed. It requires most careful investigation, and if as a result of the investigation it is found that this order was improperly issued, that it ought not to have been issued, I am willing to join with you gentlemen here or with you gentlemen there in criticism, constructive criticism, that may result in something better from the officials responsible for it. But if it is shown that it is necessary even in part, and I can see how it may be necessary while this zero weather lasts throughout the country, then it ought to be supported, in part, at least, by those gentlemen who now, with insufficient information, are plunging into the thick of this fight. The men who win the battles do not stay in the background and shoot in the back the men who are fighting. It is the men who take their places on the firing line who win battles. We ought all of us, in or outside of this body, to take our position on the firing line, to help, not to retard, and shoot in the direction of the enemy, not to shoot in the direction of the men who are leading us on in this fight we are making here in this country. [Applause.]

Out in Chicago 7,000 men are at work digging out the Chicago Junction railway tracks. Yesterday the great packing houses in Chicago suspended killing operations for want of coal. The great steel mills in the Calumet district are closed. At Gary steel mills and munition plants are closed. There always is a coal shortage at this season. To-day the unprecedented cold and the unprecedented demand contribute to make the situation so bad that even the increased production is evidently not sufficient for the emergency.

This order looks to the humane side of the proposition. It seeks to render possible the warming of the homes of the people of the land—it is introduced to insure the continued operation of our munitions plants and of all factories producing war material. The man who, without information and for a partisan advantage only, attacks it is not rendering the best service to his country.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the country certainly is stunned by this fuel order. It may be, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] states, that this order is necessary, but we might as well frankly face the fact that if this order is necessary now it is due to absolute incompetency upon the part of somebody during the past three or four months. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Illinois states that it is our duty to keep silent now. Mr. Chairman, if this order is necessary, we have now upon our soil lost the first battle against Germany. It is the business of every patriotic American citizen to-day to give thought to this question, and if any man can suggest or helpfully criticize it is his duty to do so. And if this order is necessary this House owes it to itself and the country to immediately institute an investigation of this entire situation and let us find out where the blame is in order that it may not recur again in the future.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] states that they can not unload the cars of coal. He says the coal is frozen and there is snow upon it. I live away up near the Canadian border, where our normal temperature at this time of the year is around zero very often and we supply the entire Northwest with coal. We never use dynamite in unloading coal when it is 25 degrees below zero. Perhaps it is needed here in Washington. But the gentleman can not make anyone believe that.

Now, what we ought to do—and we ought to do it this afternoon, and without the slightest partisanship on the part of anybody—is this: This question is too big to be considered from the partisan standpoint upon either side. [Applause.] We ought by resolution to ask the President to reconsider the action that has been taken. [Applause.] We ought to ask him to take final action only after being fully advised in the premises. He owes it to the country, if the necessity does exist, to put the country in possession of full information of what the necessity is, and why we have come to this situation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. In just a moment. Then I will yield. We are entitled to know why it is necessary to shut down every essential industry in this country at this time, for this period of time, as well as nonessential industries. We are entitled to know why this order, if the necessity arises, is not confined to nonessential industries for the present instead of shutting down essential industries for five days. There are some things, some lines of industry, using great quantities of fuel that could be shut down indefinitely. We could shut down every saloon east of the Mississippi River, and I do not think the country would suffer very much. [Applause.] We could shut down the breweries; we could shut down the candy factories; we could shut down factories producing things that are not necessary instead of shutting down those industries without the operation of which we can not hope to win this war.

Oh, Mr. Chairman, if we are going to start in to attempt to win this war by such methods as this, the outlook for the future is discouraging indeed. I hope that gentlemen on that side of the aisle will not assume a position of partisanship—will not assume that it is their duty to defend every department of this administration simply because they are Democrats. It is your duty as well as ours to do everything that we can to bring about a remedy for these conditions, and if there is incompetency anywhere in this administration, both sides of this aisle should stand together and demand that that incompetency should be rooted out.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman state before he closes that a resolution to ask a reconsideration of the order was offered recently by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], and that the consideration of that resolution was objected to?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; and all that that resolution did was to recommend to the President that he reconsider that action and take final action only after being fully advised of its effect. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am in hearty accord with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who has just spoken, as to the imperative necessity of informing the American people of the reasons for the far-reaching, drastic order issued by the Fuel Administrator this morning. It touches deeply the entire realm of industry—manufacturers, wage earners, and the public. It will mean vast hardships to millions of people, and the people have a right to know the reasons for it.

The American people are whole-hearted in their loyalty to the Nation in this time of crisis. They are willing to sacrifice and to pay the full price. But they must not be kept in ignorance. A free people works better and fights better when they know all the facts of the situation. I believe that concealment to-day helps Germany and that full knowledge of the truth will best serve effective prosecution of this war. An informed and aroused public opinion will force governmental efficiency, and for that reason I stand for giving that powerful agency a chance to work. Now is no time for suppression of free speech and free press, rather it is a time for turning on the light as never before so that we may have the healthful, wholesome benefits of clear sunlight.

I was interested, and I am sure every other Member here was interested, in the address delivered a few moments ago by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. His account of the battle front in Europe, which he visited personally, is of especial interest. I was struck by his statement that the strength of autocracy lies in its unity and organization and that democracy must organize along the same line or be defeated. I agree with him most heartily that America must be united and organized, but I do not admit and I do not believe he desires that we should have unity and organization after the German pattern in this country.

Never in American history has there been such an imperative need for a unified public mind as at present. Even in time of peace there is always danger in the tendency toward divided and antagonistic interests among the citizenship, groups forgetting the general welfare in an effort to obtain advantages for themselves. Because the history of democracies of the past show that their downfall came inevitably through the inability of their citizens to remain steadfast to common principles or to cooperate to common ends, many students of history declare that the great modern democracies are still "experiments in government."

But to-day, America, the oldest and the greatest of these modern democracies is engaged in mortal conflict with the mightiest military machine in the world. Conditions which meant dangerous division in time of peace have within them now the elements of absolute destruction. As the failure to answer aright the riddle of the fabled Sphinx meant death, so America must answer this problem of national unity or be destroyed. Unless this Nation can now demonstrate its ability to think and act unitedly and harmoniously and not sectionally and factionally the result will be its doom.

Every resource of America must be mobilized for this stupendous task before us. That means mustering the man power and money power, but it means much more than that. It means mobilizing the mind power, welding the judgment and conscience and will of the American people into a united force. The national mind must be unified, and the common good must be put above all private interest if the Nation is to endure.

Mr. Chairman, that task of unification must be accomplished in liberty. We can not have the nationalism of the "Germany over all" which has welded the German Empire into unity at the expense of freedom.

The German unity, founded in tyranny, is fraudulent and dangerous. In 1861 William I became King of Prussia. The great question was whether he should be Emperor of all the German States. He had declared that he would not accept the title unless all of Germany were united in desiring it. Investigation was made, and it was found that the King did not have a majority in his favor. He sent for Bismarck, whom he had ordered to Russia with the remark that he was putting him "on ice, like champagne" for future use. The King told Bismarck that he was about to abdicate, since he had neither the power of a majority or money.

Bismarck's reply characterized the fundamental theory not only of his own life but of the German Empire from that day to this. He said:

Not by speeches and resolutions of majorities are the mighty problems of the age solved, but by blood and iron.

Then the Iron Chancellor went to work to unify the Empire. It took 10 years of storm and woe to bind those States into the great nation. It took many more years of discontent and discord, heartache, waste, and suffering to bring success to that policy of "blood and iron." But at last it was accomplished, and its fulfillment meant the gravest danger to civilization in all the history of the world. Such a unified mind, trained to rely upon force as the greatest arbiter, and which puts might above right, has meant menace to America and the world and is responsible for all the horrors of this greatest war in history.

No, Mr. Chairman; America must have a united public mind in order to endure, but it must be secured through the free-will action of the people themselves. We must have discipline and we must have cooperation, but both must come from the people and not be forced upon them by any outside power.

Germany deals with every question through a government that works from the top down. America must accomplish her task through a Government that works from the bottom up. German government does not proceed from the people, is not administered by the people, and may be conducted for an end entirely opposed to the welfare of the people. American government is based on the idea that all just government must be of the people, for the people, and by the people. American unity must be that of coordination, not subordination. It must be unity, not of obedience but of agreement, not of followers but of fellows. Our task is to find the method of making every citizen realize his membership in the Nation, to combine unity with liberty.

There is absolutely no way to secure unity with liberty save by bringing people together for common counsel, so that they may understand each other. There can not be health in the human body unless there is close interrelationship of all the cells of the body. Neither can there be health in a nation without coordination and free intercourse and such a contact between all members as will constitute union. If people come together under orderly procedure for the open presentation and full discussion of their problems, the misunderstandings and divisions and hostilities that mar our unity will disappear. Then the knocker will give way to the booster, and there will be swearing by instead of at the United States of America. Then we will take the periods out of that title and make the U. S. stand for US.

But to bring people together there must be a place of meeting. Americans can not meet for common counsel to-day in the newspapers or on the telephone or over the telegraph. The place of meeting must be one where no divisive influences of caste or creed or income or partisanship hold sway. Therefore Americans can not meet in all-inclusive membership in church or club or lodge or party hall.

There is but one American institution that furnishes the necessary place for every community, where all the citizenship may gather for common counsel and to discover and promote the common interest.

It is the American schoolhouse. This institution was given by America to the world. It belongs to no group, but is the possession of all the people, irrespective of creed or income or partisanship. Its maintenance is met by public taxation, and each citizen shares equally with all others in the community of its ownership.

The public-school building is the logical center of the neighborhood, and the neighborhood is the unit of the Nation. It is being used more and more as the polling place of the precinct, where the voters gather to choose their agents in the conduct of government. On June 5 it was naturally chosen as the rallying place to which the young men of the Nation repaired to enroll in the Nation's service.

This next step is equally logical—to make of every schoolhouse in America the head-and-heart quarters of all the people of the community. Ready to our hand, it makes the ideal meeting place where all the citizenship may gather to receive information and discuss and act upon problems of common interest. It means making much more of the schoolhouse than a place of instruction for the children, used only a few hours in the day and a few days in the year. It makes of it a place of construction for the adults, the assembly place where the folks may meet to become acquainted with each other and to unite for the common good.

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Just one question. How would the gentleman heat the schoolhouses?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Oh, you bring the American people together for full discussion and deliberation and action and I will promise a solution of this coal question. There is no scarcity of coal in this country. It lies in nature's reservoirs in vast quantities, awaiting only intelligent action in production and distribution. I come from a great coal district, and I have had many operators begging me to secure cars for them and they would produce the coal. If the cars were at hand, the miners of western Pennsylvania would in the next three months produce increased supply of coal sufficient to offset the entire saving calculated by this order to-day by the Fuel Administrator. This question will be solved when you turn the mind of America upon it, and I believe the conclusion will be that coal and other natural resources are assets of the Nation, to be produced and distributed, not for private profit, but for the public good.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me return to the subject. The use of the schoolhouses as community assemblies has already been given approval by many of the leading thinkers in this country.

In 1911 President Wilson saw and expressed the readiness of these houses of the people for just this service. Pointing to the common schools that stand in every neighborhood waiting to be used, he said:

They are public buildings. They are conveniently distributed. They belong to the communities. They furnish ideal places in which to assemble and discuss public affairs. They are just what we need. I see in this movement the recovery of the constructive and creative genius of the American people.

Since that time 30 States have taken legislative action to make the schoolhouses available for adult assembly and all the larger services of which this equipment is available. The States are: California, Colorado, Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Utah, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia.

Naturally, however, this action by the separate States has no provision for linking up the community assemblies with the National Government, which must be done if we have to secure national unity through them.

I have introduced a measure, H. R. 5073, which will meet this essential need of connecting the American people directly with their own Federal Government. It is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5073) to establish direct contact between the people and the National Government by the creation of the war-information commission.

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission to be known as the United States War Information Commission, consisting of the Secretary of each executive department of the Government, together with a chairman, to be appointed by the President of the United States and to perform such duties and receive such compensation out of the appropriation herein made as may be determined by the President, is hereby created and authorized, under such rules and regulations as the President may establish, to assemble the information which the citizens of the United States should receive concerning the problems, policies, and conduct of the National Government, including the activities of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government and of the services, bureaus, boards, and commissions of the several executive departments of the United States, and the commissions created by Congress.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the United States war-information commission to collate, organize, and publish this information in a weekly bulletin and such special communications as events may require.

SEC. 3. That wherever the citizens of any public-school district shall have organized a community association to use the public-school building which their children are accustomed to attend for the purpose of assembling to consult for the common good; for efforts to increase and conserve the food supply; for cooperative endeavor to provide hospital and other supplies for the American Red Cross service; for extending the opportunity for popular subscription to Government loans; for activities intended to enhance the vigor and health of the people by means of physical training and wholesome recreation; or for other purposes designed to support and strengthen the Nation in time of war, and shall have designated the principal of said public school or a person associated with said principal to serve as community secretary, and through the said community secretary shall have made application for the bulletins and communications published by the United States war-information commission, it shall be the duty of said commission to transmit to such community association of citizens the bulletins and communications issued by it.

SEC. 4. That the offices of the United States war-information commission shall be located in conjunction with those of the Bureau of Education; and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Education to cooperate with said commission in all ways that will facilitate the carrying out of the purposes of this act.

SEC. 5. That the United States war-information commission is authorized to rent and equip offices in accordance with the foregoing section and to employ or retain and fix the compensation for the services of such assistants as it may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. And in order to defray the expenses made necessary by the provisions of this act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as Congress may hereafter determine; and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, available until expended, to be paid out upon warrants drawn upon the Secretary of the Treasury by the chairman of said commission.

This measure provides for the creation of the war information commission, which shall collect and publish all information as to the activities of the National Government which should be known by the people. It covers the work of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the Government, besides the executive departments and all bureaus, boards, commissions, and so forth.

When any community now organized or to be organized, in compliance with the provisions of this bill, requests the bulletins and other communications published by the war information commission it shall be furnished with them.

This plan has two essentials for community organization: First, there must be an all-inclusive membership. This Nation is a collection of individuals and not a collection of groups. When different groups use the school buildings for particular purposes we have a kind of hotel development. What we must have in order to secure real unity is development along the line of a home.

Daniel Webster, in a speech advocating the establishment of public schools in this country, laid down the principle which should guide us in the expanding use of these school buildings. He said:

> There are two principles connected with general public education which should be kept in view, and they are both consistent, elementary, and important. One of these principles is that the schools should be free, and the other is that they should be common. They should be free; that is, without charge. They should be common; that is, they should know nothing of classes in society. They should be open to all. No question should be asked whether he who comes for admission belongs to wealthy or indigent families. Where all are on an equality, without reference to property or birth or any other distinction, they are common schools, and no consideration of wealth should be necessary to entitle to admission.

These are exactly the requirements for the assemblies of the people in their schoolhouses. They must be free and common. No American can be rightfully shut out of his place in the brotherhood. The Declaration gives as inalienable rights those of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The right to live includes the right to live the life of a man, which can only be fulfilled in cooperation with fellow men. The right to liberty includes the right to have a part in the Nation's work, to promote the common good, and to become the server of all without becoming the slave of any. The happiness which every man has the fundamental right to pursue is human happiness, and that can only be secured through fellowship and neighborliness.

Therefore it is necessary that there shall be an all-inclusive membership, every American having a right to his place in the community assembly which is to deal with the things of the common welfare. Any exclusion must be only the self-exclusion which carries its own punishment with it.

The second requirement for community organization is the selection of the community secretary to act as the responsible servant of the assembly. Just as this Congress could not perform its duties without its clerks, so the assembly of the citizenship will not be able to perform its duties without a responsible public official. The public-school principal, or some one associated with the principal, is the logical person to act in this capacity. Such an official will link up the entire educational system, acting as the instructor of the children and the servant of the adults, who go to school, to each other, in common assembly.

Think of the stupendous possibilities for unifying the public mind involved in the plan of having the people of 400,000 communities gathering in their schoolhouses, making each citizen realize his interest as a member in the greatest enterprise in the world, this America of ours. It would bring the people into day-by-day working relationship not only with each other but with the constructive operations of the Government. There is not a problem connected with this gigantic war in which we are engaged but could be met harmoniously and solved effectively by such citizenship organization.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind there are three essentials in securing that national unity without which America will fail to secure the fruits of victory in this war, regardless of the side acclaimed victor at its end:

First. The people must fully understand and appreciate the reasons for our entrance into this war. It can not be denied that since the formal declaration by Congress the American mind has been accessible to both wholesome and diseased influences. The hesitation and uncertainties are due more or less to our mixed population, and contradictory sentiments were to be expected. Then, with the battle line 3,000 miles from our shores and no possibility of material gains for America in the conflict, it has been difficult for many Americans to realize that the Nation is in fact engaged in a war which will test its resources to the utmost.

Under such conditions it is all important that this state of mind be understood. The attempt to override misgivings and apathy by force and coercion and the prevention of the full expression of honest opinions simply means that America will be defeated and divided, even though Germany be conquered. But if the facts be placed before the people and means of expression afforded to their better impulses, America will secure from this war a new national organization and a more complete national consciousness.

If the people of America gather into the schoolhouse for common counsel and learn the whole truth of our entrance into this war against Prussianism, doubt and division will disappear in the fire of a common enthusiasm. Let them hear President Wilson's unanswerable indictment of the Imperial German Government in his war message to Congress and his later addresses; let them freely discuss the vital issues involved in this world war and the result will be the unity which comes from knowledge and acknowledged responsibility. Our citizens may not all be enthusiasts on behalf of certain of our allies, but they are all proliberty. Once let the war cry "democracy, the hope of humanity, cries for rescue" reach the heart of Americans and, no matter what their native lands may be, they will rally as one man to the sacred cause.

Second. The people must have a clear understanding of the part that is expected of every American in the conduct of the war.

I have received hundreds of letters from citizens of my district asking the one question, "What can I do?" I presume every public official in this land has met that same inquiry many times. Now, no single official, not even the President of the United States, can point out the best path of service for each and every individual. There is something for everyone to do, but the door is effectively closed unless he knows the way. It is of supreme importance that the Government be able to inform the people directly of the needs of the hour and how they may be most effectively met. That direct contact will not only best secure the concrete results desired, but there is no unifying power in the world like that of united efforts on the part of individuals working for the same cause. Give men a place to work in a movement, put responsibility on their shoulders, and you will find them standing together whole-heartedly.

Once more, this can only be done by bringing all the people together in a common meeting place where, with open presentation and full discussion of the facts, each individual may find the answer to his question, "What can I do?"

A multitude of special fields of effort are opened up, and in every one of them success depends upon the civic mobilization of the people in their various communities.

There is the question of Government loans through which the money necessary to carry on the war must be secured from the people. Billboard and other advertising does not and can not secure the consideration that should be given a solemn call of the Nation for the cooperation of its membership.

Corporation Counsel Syme, of Washington, D. C., has expressed the need forcibly when he stated, during the recent campaign for the liberty loan, that it is essential for speakers who are advocating the purchase of bonds to have the acquaintance and confidence of their hearers if they are to be successful.

What better method to secure such persons than to take them from their own communities, where they are best known, and allow them to address their neighbors in regularly organized assemblies in the schoolhouses? Other immense loans must be floated in the future, and it is the part of wisdom to arrange to have the appeal for financial support made to all the people through all the people and not to groups and by groups.

There is the vital problem of the conservation of foodstuffs. Letters have been sent to the churches asking for cooperation. But the churches do not reach all the people in common assembly; they can not by the very nature of the case. Efforts have been made to secure registration of all the women of the country, but the work has been duplicated and reduplicated, with a tremendous waste of energy.

How simple the task would be if there were a mobilization center in every community, one where all the people rallied to act and speak and serve together. Then the necessity for conservation could be explained and the registration compaign would be carried direct to all the people instead of only a part of the people.

There is the Red Cross service. A Nation-wide campaign has been carried on in support of this worthy cause, and yet the people have not generally been enlisted in it. The appeal has been made to groups of the people by duplicating and sometimes dividing agencies. Many persons have put this form of service above all others and at the expense of all others, and yet the citizenship as a whole has not been reached. The simple reason is that there is no way to reach all the people save through their common assemblies in the community centers, where this admirable cause may be presented and explained and understood by the people.

There are the problems of training-camp activities. At present a commission under the War Department is endeavoring to do the work of providing recreation for recruits in training camps and cantonments. This work, too, is entirely separated from other lines of endeavor and appeals to still other groups. Some of the field workers are said to be employees and agents of the Rockefeller Foundations. It is hardly necessary to say that any obligations owed these youthful defenders are obligations of the Nation and not of any private agency. Nor can there be found a better means for recreation and improving leisure hours than through community centers in the vicinity of these training camps. Here is wholesome environment and all the advantages of home surroundings. The fellowship of folks will banish the loneliness of recruits far from home quicker than anything else.

There is the problem of seeing that our vast immigration population understand the meaning of this war for liberty. This can never be done except by giving these immigrants the sense of belonging to the Nation. Let the foreigner feel that he is a part of the community and has a stake in it and he will help to enrich and broaden the national life instead of being an element of danger. Here is our great opportunity to weave the bonds of fraternity so that they will never be unwoven. Here is our chance to create Americanism among Americans and immigrants alike. With every community organized for service and none excluded from membership, the universality of the English language could be realized, by common action and unity of feeling create a forceful, victorious citizenship.

There is the problem of mobilizing labor in this country. The Department of Labor has declared that this is a most important question. But all plans for the use of private agencies and group efforts must necessarily be inefficient. In no way can this task of informing workers as to the best fields of service be accomplished thoroughly except by linking up the organization of the communities with the Federal Government.

I have mentioned but a few of the great problems which confront us and which can be met only by organization of all the people. Every other phase of this great world conflict in which we are engaged leads us to the same conclusion. If we are to have efficiency and unity in our efforts, there must be established the interrelationship of Americans in direct contact with their own Government.

Besides the two general essentials for centering the public mind upon the work ahead, complete understanding of our reasons for entering this war and definite directions as to the part each citizen may have in it, there is still another essential.

Third. The people must know the plans and purposes and actions of the Government in the conduct of the war itself.

This is not the President's war, nor the war of Congress. It is the people's war or it ought not to be a war at all. To make it the people's war, the people must know the news about the war. Stealth and secrecy at this time, except as to those strictly military facts knowledge of which would aid the enemy, are deadly foes of unity. Suspicion and distrust naturally surround the things which are hidden from public view. Never has the value of the sunlight in public affairs been more aptly stated than by President Wilson. Here is what he says:

> I, for one, have the conviction that government ought to be all outside and no inside. The right methods are those of public discussion, the methods of leadership open and aboveboard, not closeted with "boards or guardians," or anybody else, but brought out under the sky, where honest eyes can look upon them and honest minds judge them. * * * There is not any legitimate privacy about matters of government. Government must, if it is to be pure and correct in its processes, be absolutely public in everything that affects it. I can not imagine a public mind with a conscience having a secret that he would keep from the people about their own affairs. * * * Wherever any public business is transacted, wherever plans affecting the people are laid or enterprise touching the public welfare, comfort, or convenience go forward, wherever political programs are formulated, over that place a voice must speak with the divine prerogative of the people's will the words "Let there be light."

Such must be the attitude of the Government if we are to have a united people in this time of greatest need. Full knowledge of the facts is the very life blood of unity with liberty. Nothing will help to nationalize America so much as the joint interest of 100,000,000 Americans in the conduct of this mighty war task. With the people fully assured that they know the truth, they will be heartened and strengthened both in storm and sunshine. They will meet both good news and bad with the courageous determination to pay the price for the boon of world liberty.

Every transaction of Congress should be within the public view. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is presumed to chronicle the actions of this body, through which American public opinion finds its voice. But no man can take the time to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from cover to cover each day and I am frank to say that it would not pay him to do so even if he had the time. Nor can the newspapers give complete reports of all debates, with the roll calls on all measures.

Still, it is possible to summarize the RECORD, avoiding all routine procedure, deadwood of all kinds, and get the gist of all matters and the votes of Representatives of the people on all measures.

These facts, together with accounts of the actions of all other branches of the Government, placed before the community assemblies of America, would furnish each citizen with the knowledge he should possess if he is to intelligently perform his duties as a citizen. The direct messages would come directly from the Government to the people and would be accepted with confidence.

Mr. Chairman, such official and authoritative information would prove an effective antidote for the poisonous rumors that are always spread broadcast under war-time conditions. Cabinet officials have been obliged to issue formal denial of false rumors. Secretary Daniels stated that the stories circulated concerning a great naval disaster have led him to the conclusion that "there is an organized conspiracy on foot to alarm and distress the people of the United States." Secretary Baker has been forced to issue a signed denial of the statement that contractors paid on a cost-plus basis were paying double prices for labor and material in order to increase their own profits. Other officials have been forced to take similar steps to counteract false and baseless statements.

What better method could be devised for meeting and defeating such canards than to have the facts come directly from the Government to the community assemblies? No false stories circulated in print or by word of mouth could stand before an official statement from the Government to the people. Without such connection, however, these rumors and baseless fabrications are sure to have disquieting and divisive influence upon the American people.

It is impossible to even name all the manifold ways in which the linking up of the National Government with the people would unify the public mind. With the people gathered in their community meeting places, organized for deliberate discussion of all problems, the resultant together-acting would assure that unity needed above all other things.

But it can not be done by any private agency. The United States Chamber of Commerce has suggested that it be used as a kind of clearing house of information from Government to people. In the June issue of the Nation's Business, the official organization of the chamber, is the following statement:

It should be made clear beyond the possibility of misunderstanding what the individual citizen must do in cooperation with the Government. Copies of resolutions setting forth the desirability of such a campaign were mailed on May 24 by the national chamber to all members with the request for an expression of opinion. The flood of replies has been a practically unanimous and whole-hearted approval of the committee's suggestion.

There is a very multitude of such private organizations seeking to do this work. The Patriotic Service League has been organized in New York. The American League for National Unity has been recently organized here in Washington. The National Defense League is in existence in a number of cities. As more of these are organized, the complications and chaotic conditions will increase. However worthy these organizations may be, I submit that they represent and can reach only groups of the people and what we need now is an all-inclusive organization that reaches all the people for all causes and not a part of the people for a part of the war program. There is but one way to accomplish this, and that is through the schoolhouse-center plan of organization, and there should be no delay in getting it in operation.

I have said that this organization of the citizenship in the community will bring unity to America. No one needs to take that statement on faith alone. It is not a theory, but has been demonstrated in actual experience. France has taught us how the schoolhouse can be used by a democracy in making war. We gave France the idea of the public school and she has seen and fulfilled its possibilities better than we have ourselves.

Every week the minister of education sends to every schoolteacher in France the Bulletin Administratif, a summary of the activities of the Government, the progress of the military and naval forces, facts about Government loans, the honor roll of the fighting forces, and anything of national interest. This bulletin is read to all the citizens of each community gathered in the schoolhouses. President Wilson's war message was read in every schoolhouse in France and every man and woman in the Republic heard the reasons for America's entrance into the great war.

There is no attempt to hide facts from the people. If the news be bad, the people know it, and set their jaws in added determination to win. If the news be good, there is quiet rejoicing, but the same firm-lipped determination to press on until the goal set has been attained.

France has the telegraph-flash bulletin and the newspapers as we have. But it is the weekly bulletin, read in the schoolhouses to all the people, that has set the entire nation to thinking together and has welded the entire nation into one mighty force for victory. This is the real unity, not of a mailed fist, crushing people into a shapeless and unprotesting mass of humanity, but the unity of the clasped hand of friendship and fellowship.

Well has Arthur Bullard, in his brilliant little book, Mobilizing America, paid a glowing tribute to this plan of unifying a nation. He says:

Here is a quiet, steady, unobtrusive influence that is vastly significant. When the history of this war is written, the school mistresses of France will deserve great credit. They have done "their bit" by explaining to the people the events of the war, stimulating their patriotism, unifying their thinking, and keeping them from discouragement.

My highest hope for America is that she will show the united front to every foe, the noble unity, that has marked the conduct of France. The very name is a symbol of heroism—France, the gallant, valiant, unconquerable, because of her united purpose and undivided will.

Little wonder is it that when a call was sent out for a fitting poetical expression of American sentiment in this war that the poem adjudged worthiest was entitled the "Road to France." It was written by Daniel M. Henderson, and a few of the lines are as follows:

Thank God our liberating lance
Goes flaming on the way to France.
To France with every race and breed
That hates Oppression's brutal creed.
At last, thank God, at last we see
There is no tribal liberty.
The soul that led our fathers West,
Turns back to free the world's opprest.
See with what hearts we now advance
To France.

Our hearts glow with the thought of being a fellow fighter with this heroic nation of the invincible spirit. Shall we not also attain to her unity of consecration in this war? America may accomplish it just as France has accomplished it—by organizing democracy through the community center, so that the whole people, every man, woman, and child, will come into vital and effective union for the common cause.

But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, our task in this momentous era of world history is not only to win the war against the Imperial German Government. We must also make good that victory in the organization of democracy for the sake of America. Pasteur, the great scientist, himself a tanner's son, has given us a splendid definition of democracy.

The true democracy is that which permits each individual to put forth his maximum effort.

In other words, the democracy we seek recognizes the equal worth of every man, his right to an equal voice in government, and to have a fair chance in the race of life. America's greatest test is not the trial by combat with Germany; it is the need to make sure that no internal foes shall destroy government of the people, for the people, and by the people.

Lord Bryce, the famous English statesman and author, makes a pertinent statement in this connection. He says:

The danger of a democracy is that people will lose interest and turn things over to the political boss. When this is done we get the worst form of government possible; that is, we are governed by the worst in the worst possible way.

Now, the political boss is only the agent of special privileged interests that seek to control government for their own selfish ends. We have in this country financial junkers who seek blood profits out of this war, and no plea of patriotism seems to move their stony hearts. They would monopolize food and fuel and steel and munitions, and use the despicable power thus obtained to wrest illegitimate profits from the Nation. These financial pirates form a serious menace to our democracy. They stop at nothing. Their political "bosses" perform the grosser acts of treason, such as manipulation of the ballot and stuffing the ballot box. They corrupt and coerce and bribe; they threaten and promise and cajole; all for the purpose of securing governmental power to satisfy their traitorous lust for gold.

But every success of these evil interests are due to the fact that they are organized. Although those who profit from their black-flag methods constitute but an insignificant minority of the citizenship, they have been bound closely by the "cohesive power of public plunder," and thus are able often to defeat the great mass of the people, helpless because unorganized.

There is a supreme duty resting upon every American citizen who puts patriotism above profits in this time of national stress. It is to fight at the polls every agent of these financial traitors and plunderers. These disloyal profit seekers must be eliminated from government, and it must be done by patriotic Americans. There is only one way to drive these treasonable interests and their agents, the political "bosses," out of the control of government, and that is for the people to take control themselves.

But the people must be organized if they are to control. They must be able to get together to act upon vitally important matters. The lack of interest in political affairs, feared by Lord Bryce, is inevitable unless there can be gatherings of the citizens to discuss them. Mind acts upon mind, and it is only by the interchange of opinions that real interest can be manifested.

We have provided for the meeting and organization of representatives of the people, but have forgotten the people themselves. We have planned to have the agents come together for common counsel and action, but have neglected the coming together of the principals. We have provided buildings for the makers of laws to meet in—the city hall, the statehouse, the National Capitol—but the makers of these lawmakers have been compelled to act in haphazard, disorganized, isolated fashion.

Naturally the ballot and other instruments of democracy can not be used to best advantage without cooperation. An orchestra may have the best instruments obtainable, but unless the members get together for practice and united efforts the combined result of their activities is only horrible discord. It is equally true that the citizenship can not use the instruments of democracy to solve the problems of the common good in America without getting together and practicing democracy.

As Walt Whitman, the old gray poet of democracy, phrased it much better than Lord Bryce, I desire to quote his words:

Of all dangers to a nation, as things exist in our day, there can be no greater one than having certain portions of the people set off from the rest by a line drawn—they not privileged as others, but degraded, humiliated, made of no account—to work in, if we may so term it, and justify God His divine aggregate, the people. This, I say, is what democracy is for, and this is what our America means and is doing. If not, she means nothing more and is doing nothing more than any other land.

The discord in political affairs, the "invisible government," "boss rule," and "machine control" are plague spots on the body politic, due to disunion of the citizenship cells of that body, their sundering into a multitude of conflicting groups, whch prevent healthy and wholesome action.

Once the people are organized in their schoolhouses to act as citizens and neighbors, not as partisans and members of a special faction, the last call for grafters and financial highway-men and political bosses will be sounded and they must go. Then we may have the democracy for which we fight across the seas to-day. It will be a government not of repression and fear and compulsion alone, but of mutual help and cooperation.

The proposal embodied in my measure to bring the people of 400,000 communities into their community centers, the schoolhouses, and to link them up directly with their Government, is the very essence of government by the people, for the people.

It will encourage the formation of deliberate and independent judgment upon the part of the voters, instead of a blind following of disloyal, dissembling, and designing leaders.

It is the sure means of destroying the power of the "boss" and enabling the people to protect themselves against misrule and exploitation.

It will remove the stigma from party machinery because the cogs, wheels, and levels of the mechanism, without which no party can be conducted, will be composed of the people themselves.

It is a guaranty that the public interests will take precedence over private interests, since the great masses of the people have no selfish interests to serve and ask nothing but a square deal and no favors.

I have been speaking of the importance of an organized citizenship from the standpoint of the voters. But let me go further and say that such organization will be a boon to every faithful public official. Too often the official, under present conditions, is either the victim of blind suspicion or blind worship and one honors him as little as the other.

I believe that the public official has a right to demand that if there is a complaint of any kind it should have a definite voice in an assembly where the entire matter can be debated, contradicted, qualified, and reduced to definite feasibility and presented for action. There is all the difference in the world between vague growling and constructive criticism, backed by the community association that has considered the question and gives the facts upon which to base remedial action.

Every newspaper contains letters of protest from those who growl about certain conditions. Very seldom do they give names, dates, or facts upon which anybody anxious to set things right could act. At the same time there may be a law on the statute books for the express purpose of dealing with the abuse complained of, and an official may be ready and willing to act upon it.

The average Member of Congress is anxious to serve his constituents faithfully. He does not want to be above the people but with the people. But often he can not determine the will of his people, since they have no method of conveying to him an authoritative expression of their composite desire. He receives letters and endless resolutions and petitions, but when he comes to analyze them he finds that radically opposing views are about equally balanced in the communications he receives.

There is no way for the formulation and expression of the desire of the people on any question except by an all-inclusive organization. No group or class can assume to speak for all the citizenship. Each looks at the problem from its own angle and with its own particular bias. But when the entire citizenship joins in community consideration of the question, the resultant expression is the popular will, no more and no less.

Such a deliberate decision is not like the form letters and circular petitions which now come to Members of Congress in such numbers, and which are often signed by people who do not stop to read them. In an assembly of the people gathered for serious business and with the common welfare in mind, ideas that are false, statements that are baseless, and plans that are unsound can not stand the test of the scrutiny to which they are subjected. As Carlisle has said:

> The brazier that discovered that brass is green cheese, when he acts upon his discovery finds, singular as it may seem, that brass can not be masticated for dinner and that cheese can not be beaten into fireproof dishes. His discovery, therefore, has no legs to stand on and must be let fall.

A mere notion can always be exploded by the demand for definite details, and such a demand is the first to be made in an assembly of the people deliberately considering the common good.

Then, too, the organization of the citizenship would be a boon to the legislator who to-day feels himself under obligations to secure appropriations from the Public Treasury for his own district.

I have seen in a recent magazine a statement that was said to have been made by a Member of Congress. It was printed as follows:

> The Federal Government is a grab bag, out of which I am expected to grab my share of the loot for my district, and the more I get the better Congressman I am and the surer of being sent back.

Such an attitude on the part of any district in America does not represent even the best interests of the district concerned, to say nothing of the Nation at large. It is bribery of the people with money out of their own pockets and will be so recognized as soon as there is the organization which will bring to the average citizen a realization of his membership in the Nation and his common interest in it.

When the people see that a wasteful public expenditure for a public building or river improvement in their own district must of necessity be balanced by a similar waste of funds in other districts, they will insist that their representatives stand for the whole people in the expenditure of money, not the people of districts or States or sections.

Every sane American believes in appropriations for public buildings and river and harbor improvements, and, of course, that means improvements in certain districts. But one test should be applied to every such improvement: "Does it mean advancement of the general welfare of the Nation?" With that test applied by an intelligent citizenship watching Congress and discussing its activities in their community assemblies, the intolerable situation that compels many Members to vote for projects which are utterly unworthy in order to secure others they believe meritorious will disappear. Then every demand, whether of district or railroad or pensioner, can be freely and openly considered and decided in the common interest. Then a Member of Congress can act upon the merits of every proposal instead of being obliged to "log roll" projects which are expensive to the Commonwealth and injurious to the common good.

Looked at from any angle, the organization of the citizenship of America into community organizations and connected directly with the National Government will mean a mighty stride forward toward democracy.

It means organization of the citizenship of America for ruling the Nation. It trusts the people, the wise and the ignorant, the good and the bad, with the gravest problems that can confront a nation, believing that thereby the citizenship is educated and justice secured.

No one can oppose such a plan except those who do not trust the people and those who fear people's rule. The believer in democracy wants the power placed in the hands of the people, and when he studies the present situation he knows that the power is not there. Who are the people? They are 60,000,000 adults scattered over America, working at their daily tasks, unorganized, inarticulate, each really unknown to his neighbor. Before the people can really rule they must act together, and to act together there must be common counsel in meeting places, where the common interests may be discovered.

To those who do not believe the people are intelligent enough to rule, I would only say that they have no place in a government, founded as ours is on the sovereignty of the people. They are wrong, for no man, though he have the wisdom of a latter-day Solomon, is as wise as all the people. The term "superior class" was coined by those who belong to it. It has always been a menace, a curse to itself and all other classes in society. The "divine right of kings" was based on the theory that one man had a monopoly of wisdom in government. But the shameful records of countless kaisers and czars and emperors have taught the world that wisdom is not the possession solely of the few in authority. In the light of all the history of the past, our task is clearly cut out before us. It is to find the method by which all the intelligence of the community may be brought to bear on the government of the community.

That method is found in bringing all the people together in their own building, to work out in their own way the problems as they appear. Let no one be concerned about regulations of censorship, as to what the people shall do and say in their schoolhouses. As little need to regulate what shall be said by members of the family around their own hearthstones. The self-restraint of Americans, meeting as members of the community home circle for the promotion of the common good, is the only compulsion necessary and the only one that can be rightfully used. The sense of propriety and justice among the people can be trusted above anything else. As Bancroft said:

> The universal conscience is the nearest approach that we have to the voice of God.

To those who fear democracy I would only say: Read the history of the origin of this world war which has set the earth in flames. It was not begun by democracies, but by nations that had repudiated every idea of people's rule. Because the people of Germany and Austria could not control conquest-lustful despots, the entire world groans under this most fearful of all conflicts. Now, the very rulers responsible have brought about their doom and hang trembling to the thrones they shall certainly lose before the war is over. They brought not only ruin to their peoples but to themselves.

Just so it is with special privileged classes within our own Nation, who tremble lest real democracy should mark their doom. Their own safety depends upon the people being given supreme power in this Nation. If there is continued damming up of the might torrents of the people's will, the flood that is sure as destiny itself will sweep them to destruction.

Mr. Chairman, it is a noteworthy fact that every victory for democracy means betterment for those who mistakenly fought the advance. The British Empire that strove to hold the American colonies in chains would never have built the towering structure of the present had not America taught her that despotism is a foundation perilous and insecure. England is mightier and nobler to-day because the Revolution here proved that self-government is a right of colonies which can not be safely withheld. Canada and Australia are eloquent examples of this fact, for the troops from these colonies have been in the forefront of every battle for the mother country.

The triumph of Lincoln's idea of human freedom freed the Southland just as surely as the black race. There business, society, religion, and politics were poisoned and perverted to maintain the false doctrine that human slavery was right. Always there hung overhead the Damocles sword of a possible slave rebellion. Slaveholders looked into the faces of their chattels and trembled lest in some time of uprising these servile ones might let loose the demons of murder and destruction. America could not be powerful enough to uphold the rights of her bravest and strongest and at the same time scorn the right of the humblest slave on the banks of the Mississippi. The blow that struck the shackles from the slaves of the South freed the white man just as surely and the marvelous development, expressed in the words "The New South" gives eloquent testimony to that fact.

So, too, it will be in the triumph of democracy in America, with full and complete power in the hands of the citizenship, organized and trained in neighborly deliberation and decision.

Let us raise aloft the light of democracy by lighting the lamps of the schoolhouses for the gathering of the people.

What a beacon of liberty that will be. Outlining our land boundaries and watery margins, from the great northern lakes, by Niagara and the St. Lawrence, by the Atlantic beaches, far out to Porto Rico, beyond the Gulf and Carribbean, Uncle Sam's great southern lakes, southward across Panama, up the western coast past the golden shores of California to the Columbia and Puget Sound, along the international boundary eastward again—as the sun goes down and the stars come out over eastern Maine, the lighted windows of schoolhouses twinkle out of the dark; cheery, welcoming lights of schoolhouse community centers.

Westward with the spreading darkness will shine out community-center lights in river valleys of the Penobscot and Kennebec, along the Connecticut, the Hudson, and the Mohawk, by the Delaware and the James, they follow the Santee and the Savannah, and way down on the Suwanee River the inspiring strains of Dixie stir the blood of old folks and young, gathered in neighborly counsel to discuss the problems of America, the great human enterprise of the world.

From where Louisiana spans our mighty spinal river, sparkling points of light from schoolhouse windows trace the course of the Fathers of Waters and all the nation-enmeshing valleys of his 25,000 miles of tributary waterways.

Our harried neighbors south of the Rio Grande hear the friendly voices from lighted doorways, and with the hope of better days send the hail "Amigos" across the northern bank.

There will be lights up Salt River, down by Colorado's canyons, on solitary mesas, and garden spots redeemed from the desert wastes. In farm villages across the prairies, in little mining towns far up the slopes of the Rockies and the Sierra Nevadas, and lonely lumber camps among tall firs and gigantic redwoods in valleys of the Cascades and Coast Range Mountains, look in at the lighted windows and see our folks gathered in their schoolhouses in the splendid, kindly task of making a nation.

There are lights in New York City, metropolis of the world; in Washington, where gather Representatives to speak and act for all the people; in Pittsburgh, with its flaming furnaces that turn night into day; in Chicago, youthful marvel of enterprise and achievement; in San Francisco, that speaks of heroic rising from the ashes of disaster; in all the cities between the kindly lights of community schoolhouses twinkle an invitation which shall break down barriers of loneliness and doubt and distrust and make each and all feel the sense of belonging to America.

There are lights under the Arctic Circle where every native Alaskan school is a community center; and in beautiful Samoa, in Hawaii, little Guam, and the Philippines, there the lights, too, are flashing and the white man's burden grows easier in their radiance.

Where the farthest west becomes the Far East, as the last-lighted window up Lingayen way winks out in "good night" to China, the earliest riser in the United States—maybe a farmer lad in Maine—seems to hear again the words of the President of the United States he heard last night at the schoolhouse community center, feels again the blood tingle at the call to noblest purpose that could come to man or Nation—the challenge of democracy assailed by powerful enemies and needing rescue.

Mr. Chairman, that is a picture of what may be accomplished. It is our part to put reality into the vision, to make the possibility an established fact.

The schoolhouses furnish the way out of the desert of division into the green garden of unity and brotherhood. They stand ready for use as the machinery of nationalization. They are meeting places for the great fraternity of America, whose membership is as wide as the Nation, and requires no qualification except the belief in fellowship and the will to try democracy. Its grip is the handclasp of good will, its motto "Each for all, all for each, and all together for the common cause." Its emblem is the glorious—over-all victorious—banner of the stars which floats over every American schoolhouse as a token of the victory of America over the hates and ignorance and prejudice that divided us, the triumph of that progress which is the onward stride of Almighty God.

The starting point of every good,
Of larger life, is brotherhood;
Its fear-free banners now unfurled
Mean hope of peace to all the world.
If we can meet and join as one
Here from all lands beneath the sun,
Then neighbor nations, too, shall in our time
Forge world-wide union in a bond sublime.

Then in this sacred common place,
Which we have builded that the race
May nobler be in mind and heart,
We join that we may have our part
In neighbor union without bound,
That, spreading all the earth around,
Seeking naught less than mankind's common good,
At last shall make the world one neighborhood.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I happened not to be here until just as the gentleman from Illinois finished his remarks, but inasmuch as he brought up the subject of the fuel order, I think it proper to explain why I introduced the resolution which I did. It was drawn after hasty consultation with some other gentlemen. It was drawn in no bitter or narrow or partisan spirit. I think the reading of the resolution shows that. It certainly is as mild and devoid of criticism as possible, and it was intentionally so. But I thought that it was proper on a matter of this tremendous importance, where I believe every man in this House this morning was shocked to find that the step had been taken—I thought it was proper that this House should respectfully and courteously express its opinion.

I understand some resolution on the subject has been introduced in the Senate by an administration supporter this afternoon, and as nobody else here introduced it I undertook to give this House an opportunity to express itself. I regret that my request for the consideration of the resolution was not granted.

Now, that resolution simply requests that there should be a reconsideration and reflection on this proposition. I believe that is a feeling that nearly every man in this House has. It is the most stupendous act that has been taken during all this administration. It will cost millions of dollars in the loss of wages; it will cost millions of dollars in the loss of production, much of it indispensable and essential articles. It is a great blow and calamity to this country, a double calamity, because the very news of it in Germany will enable them to say, "Our opponent across the water is obliged to shut down their industries." It is as much as a great victory to the Germans, and is likely to cause distrust and panic here.

It is possible, I suppose, that it is indispensable. I do not wish to go into the question of the trouble with our coal supply. I have very decided views on the subject, but I can not express them without doing what I have avoided in the resolution, and what I have avoided on the floor of the House, making a severe criticism upon the administration, and that I do not wish to indulge in, for I genuinely want to support it and hold up its hands in everything for the prosecution of this war. But it does not seem to me that this step is going to help the war but to endanger it. The trouble with coal, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] said, is not a shortage of coal, the trouble is with the transportation, and we supposed when the United States assumed all the transportation facilities of the country that it would use its absolute power to remedy these difficulties and transport the coal, but apparently all of the railroad skill and experience of Secretary McAdoo has been wasted and the coal situation has grown steadily worse.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did the gentleman before or in the preparation of the resolution consult with any gentleman upon this side of the Chamber?

Mr. GILLETT. No; I did not; and I will tell the gentleman why, as I did the leader of that side. I should have consulted him upon it, but I came back from the funeral of Maj. Gardner just in time to prepare the resolution and catch the Speaker's eye at 3 o'clock. That was the only opportunity I would have to do it before the House adjourned this afternoon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman object to having the resolution read in his time? It will take but a minute, and quite a number of gentlemen did not hear it.

Mr. GILLETT. No; if I have the time.

Resolved, That the House regrets the summary action of the Fuel Administrator in suddenly closing the industries dependent upon a coal supply and, in view of the disorganization of business certain to follow, and the consequent idleness and distress of labor, urges a reconsideration of the order by the President, and that final action be taken only after being fully advised of its effect.

Now, that was a proper and pertinent question by the gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I asked it in view of the statement made by the gentleman in the beginning. It is not a partisan matter.

Mr. GILLETT. I intended it as a nonpartisan matter. As I say, I did not consult with gentlemen on that side of the House, but I should be very glad if it had been introduced by that side of the House, as it was in the Senate.

Mr. RAINEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will state that a resolution almost similar in its nature was introduced in the Senate by Senator HITCHCOCK, a Democratic Senator.

Mr. GILLETT. I am very glad of it. I have not seen the resolution that was introduced in the Senate, but I understood it was substantially a resolution for postponement.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Did not the gentleman from Massachusetts, at the first opportunity, consult with Members on the Democratic side of the House?

Mr. GILLETT. I did immediately afterwards, but it was not until after I had attempted to introduce the resolution. I then consulted the leader on that side of the House.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it would seem, in view of the discussion that is taking place to-day, not only here but all over the country, and in view of the order that has been issued by the Fuel Administration ordering the closing down of all business enterprises and amusements for a period of days, that if the Kaiser had deliberately planned this coup he could not have done it any better or more effectively to help and aid Germany than Dr. Garfield has done it in issuing this order. I am not going to speak on this subject, but upon one closely allied to it, a subject just as important to the winning of the war as is this coal situation.

Mr. Speaker, the one important business in America to-day is the war. More and more we are beginning to realize the seriousness of the situation. Not since the opening of the Revolutionary War have the people of this country been faced by the necessity of united and instant action as they are faced by it now. The country is back of this war, and we must arise united and wage the war to a successful termination, this war for humanity, or let America, liberty, and justice perish from the earth.

We are mobilizing an Army of 2,000,000 men, this in addition to a Navy comprising a man force of over 300,000 fully equipped, which will be increased to 20,000,000 if necessary. In doing this we have drawn and are drawing the young men from all vocations of life. In order to make up this full quota Congress passed at the suggestion of the administration the selective conscription law. The workings of this law, while in the main successful, have in some instances created hardships and will interfere, I am afraid, somewhat in the production of foodstuffs. I speak particularly of the large percentage of young men taken from the farms or from those pursuits which are engaged in agricultural production, the production of foodstuffs, the importance of which can not be underestimated.

I desire to emphasize the importance of the agricultural industry at this time as one of the strong arms necessary to aid America to win the war, and to repeat what everyone knows, that the battle front is from the farms of the United States to the trenches of Europe, and the line must be kept open and supplied or else we fail.

The American farm is one of the most important elements in this whole line, and it is up to the American farmer to bear the strain of the greatest effort America ever made, and in this connection it is necessary that he be supplied with the instruments necessary to fight his part of this battle.

As I view the situation, there is no need to develop new lands or encourage the transfer of ownership during this time of great stress. If the farmers of this country can get the land now under cultivation properly farmed there will be an abundance of food for everybody. It is not the lack of credit that is taking the men from the farms but the failure of Congress to provide for the dire situation in which we are placed. If Congress does not awaken to this condition that we are under and provide some adequate relief between now and the 1st of March there will be bread lines in every city of the United States next winter and our allies and armies will need food desperately.

This war can be lost in the United States in our mobilizing of this and our industrial situation, and if we are not careful in our planning at this time we may lose the war before we have had a chance to strike a blow at the enemy in Europe with our Army and Navy.

Regarding the selective-conscription law I desire to say that it is a wonderful success, and all credit is due to the men who have had the administration of the law in their hands, and I might say in passing that to my mind—and I believe in saying this I voice the sentiment of the entire Congress and the people generally of the United States—that in his sincere, broad-minded, far-seeing administration of this law Enoch H. Crowder, Provost Marshal General, has proven himself to be one of the biggest men that this crisis has developed. His task has been a big one and tremendously important, and, when you consider the fact that an Army of 2,000,000 men is now almost completely mobilized, and that this has been done within a period of a little over six months, it is a wonderful undertaking and speaks for itself; but the conscription law as affecting the production of foodstuffs is in its administration working a hardship, and the situation, I know, has caused a great deal of anxiety to the Provost Marshal and to the administration and up to this time has not been definitely solved.

What should be done, as I see it, is to provide for a parole of some of the expert farmers already taken into the camps and place them back on the farms, and then keep on conscripting the men and paroling and assigning these men back to the farms from which they were taken, and in that way get a lot of young men who have left the farms and gone into the unnecessary industries back to the farms, where they belong. If Congress leaves these things to be worked out without legislation, I am fearful that the delay may cause much suffering and starvation before the end of another winter. It is true that the cost-plus system adopted by the Government has upset labor and corrupted in a measure our public works, and the only way that I can figure is to get the conscriptive law to tell a lot of these people where to go and what to do or place in the hands of the Secretary of War authority to parole and assign men to the farms.

One thing sure, the farmers of the country are not going to plant on promises during this coming season. They will work early and late themselves, but they will only plant what they can tend and harvest unless the Government gives them the substantial proof of real support which they insist is necessary. Take it in the State of Pennsylvania, that with all the talk about the increase of wheat there is only a 5 per cent increase in acreage, and, with the crop planted at least two weeks late, the normal prospect for next year is for an 80 per cent crop instead of an increase.

In this connection I wish to quote from a letter received by me from the dean of Pennsylvania State College, in which he says:

We are very much interested in the farm-labor problem. The situation is certainly very serious. Much of the wheat in Pennsylvania does not look well because it was sown too late. This, in all probability, will mean a shortage next year. Recently I have heard of potato growers who were unable to harvest their crops, one man having 10 acres not harvested. Farmers need labor with experience, and there are hundreds and thousands of farm-reared boys in the factories of the State who ought to be working on farms and their places taken in the factories by men who are not now engaged in necessary enterprises above the conscription age.

The price of wheat has been stabilized by price fixing, but the price of bran and middlings that the farmer must buy to feed his live stock is still going higher and higher. There is one thing that so many people fail to realize, and that is that the farmer is one of the most expert workmen in this country, and at this time he is greatly handicapped by the fact that every branch of activity is drawing the farmer boys. The trolley lines give the farmer boys the preference, the banks gladly take them in, the railroads want them, and the factories go after them, and the professions draw, and now the Army and the Navy are finding their best type of men among the farmer boys, and are drawing the lifeblood from the country homes. It presents a serious situation when we expect an increased production of foodstuffs necessary to feed ourselves, our allies, and our Army. The farmers of my State are terribly worried over the situation, and are asking and expecting some relief.

During the past summer the work on our Pennsylvania farms was done under a great handicap because of this labor deficiency. The farmers worked harder and longer hours than they have for years. Skilled labor was never so deficient, so that our bountiful crops were due wholly to the unusual patriotic efforts of our farmers and their families. As I have already stated, the labor shortage was due to a considerable number of our young men enlisting or being drafted for military service, but the main reason for the shortage was the employment in mills, factories, mines, and other large industries which could afford to pay higher wages than the farmer could stand in the production of ordinary farm crops. For example, three sons of a good Pennsylvania farmer to my knowledge left the farm for employment in brickworks where they earn from $6 to $10 a day, and sometimes more.

Again, another boy in the same county who was employed in making bricks earned $196 in two weeks. Coal miners are also able to earn from $5 to $8 or more a day, and this situation has drawn many young men from the farms. This is a hard situation for the farmers. Then, too, the usual amount of fall plowing has not been done in Pennsylvania because of the labor situation and unseasonable weather, and this means that the farmers will be later next spring in getting out their crops. In other words, the accumulative effect of the labor shortage will show more and more if this situation continues.

This whole matter is having a most undesirable psychological effect, and so many cornfields and potato patches and other cultivated areas received very poor attention last year on account of labor shortage that the farmers can not be expected to plant such large areas this year, but if some adequate solution of this supply of labor can be worked out the situation will be radically different. But I want to say to the Members of the House that the farmers are not in the proper frame of mind at this time to be urged into increased production, and this is a most serious phase of the whole problem. The farmers of my State are just as patriotic as any other branch of people and they want to do everything possible to increase production, but you can plainly see and understand that there is absolutely no use of a man putting in more crops than he can care for and harvest. I have conferred with many farmers, as well as extension workers, about this point, so that I feel that this statement of the situation is correct. Taking this all into consideration, it seems to me that the only solution of this problem is to mobilize on our farms the skilled farm labor of the country. This is not a simple proposition and presents many complicated phases, but properly worked out it is, in my judgment, the only solution to the increased food proposition.

It would mean the conscription of labor for farm work, and I believe that our farm boys, even the ones now working in mills and factories at higher wages, would not object to such an arrangement and would patriotically cooperate if such provision were made by the Government. These boys must be made to feel that they are doing the work that Uncle Sam wants them to do, and that their position is an honorable one in the great world struggle, and will be duly recognized by them.

Equally important with the boys who have grown up on the farms, and recognizing that increased food production is equally as important with all other necessary organizations, I believe that I am not prejudiced when I say a word in behalf of the work being done by the extension men, which includes our county agents and extension specialists working through the various State colleges under the Smith-Lever law. These men are especially trained and fitted and are a vital factor in increasing production, and are thus helping to win the war. The farmers of the country are looking up to these men for direction and guidance and have confidence in them and their ability to assist them toward increased production, and look upon them as leaders just as the Army looks up to its officers.

These men are carefully picked for their particular jobs just as the officers of the Army are well trained for the position of leadership which they occupy. Not only have they been well trained, but they are carefully selected, keeping in view qualities of leadership which they possess. To remove these men from their present positions—"and practically all of them are within conscription age"—it seems to me, would be equivalent to removing all the officers from the Army and leaving the Army without anyone to look to for leadership.

These men are patriotic and anxious to serve their country. I am sure that most of them, if not all of them, believe that from the standpoint of service they can do more in their present position than in the Army. These men feel, however, that the farmers and others with whom they are working may not appreciate the fact in a proper way. When a farmer or other people in the county have had their sons drafted into the Army, they may feel that these county agents and extension men should also go, without stopping to realize that their present service is more valuable than Army service to which they would be assigned in the ranks. Again, as these men well know, after this war "is over—and this applies to the farmer boys as well as these extension men"—the men who have stood the brunt in the trenches are quite likely to furnish the leadership of the country, just as was the case following the Civil War. The veterans of the war in a few years from now will turn out to parade, and the farmer boy and these extension men will be asked, Where were you that you are not marching in our ranks? These farmer boys and extension men feel that they are losing something by not going in the Army, although because of the fact they feel a greater service is being rendered they are remaining in their present positions and making what is to them a sacrifice. If I understand it correctly, large numbers of these men drafted into the Army will be trained to do special work with the maintenance of the Army, but not necessarily in the trenches. Is it not a fair proposition that those who occupy vital positions in the feeding of our people—the allies and our Army—should be given military recognition? I believe that proper relief might be afforded through Senate bill 3471, introduced by Senator CHAMBERLAIN on January 15, which bill is as follows:

A bill (S. 3471) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant furloughs without pay and allowances to enlisted men of the Army of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That, whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of War the interests of the service or the national security and defense render it necessary or desirable, the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to grant furloughs to enlisted men of the Army of the United States with or without pay and allowances, or with partial pay and allowances, and, for such periods as he may designate, to permit said enlisted men to engage in civil occupations and pursuits.

This bill places in the hands of the Secretary of War great latitude and power. I believe if properly administered by him that the necessary relief is afforded in this measure to solve this farm-labor situation and to provide and take care of the question that arises in the minds of the young farmer and these men engaged in this increased agricultural production by placing them in the Army and the granting of furloughs to these enlisted men without pay and permitting them to go back to the farms and their vocations and pursue the occupation of increasing the production of foodstuff and thus avoiding any future criticism after the close of the war as regards the part that these patriotic men have played in winning the war.

In this connection, and in the handling this situation it would seem to me that we should have enlisted the biggest man in the United States that is now available, who should be named as a food-production administrator, one who can and has the ability to work on the imagination of all the people, the consumer as well as the producer, who will devote his entire time to the supreme necessity of increased food production. In this connection, I want to refer to the fact that the Secretary of Labor, with the approval of the President, has just appointed an advisory council on labor, which council will have full power to deal with every phase of the labor problem, including enrollment, distribution, transportation, housing, and the training of workers for the Army, Navy, Shipping Board, and other Government agencies, as well as for private industries engaged on war work. In short, it will have general charge of the mobilization of the industrial army of the country to make it most efficient, and unless the farmers and the farm-labor situation is mobilized in a similar manner and upon a basis where a man who stays on the farm and helps to win the war is placed in the same position as the man who does the organization and other work in the Army and is given the same credit and recognition for faithful service rendered, this situation will drift along and will continue to embarrass and handicap this country in winning the war. I therefore hope that this Chamberlain bill or some other remedial legislation covering this situation will be enacted immediately by this Congress, as I believe that every arm of the farm-labor force of the United States should be applied at this time, as it will be a determining factor in the winning of this war. [Applause.]

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that those gentlemen who have already spoken on the bill have the right to extend and revise their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, can that be done in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have no objection providing that carries with it the provision that they do not incorporate outside material such as letters and telegrams.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I repeat my question, can that be done in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the same condition to that request.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the only thing I desire to include is the short act of the English Parliament creating the department of munitions that I referred to.

Mr. STAFFORD. That would not be offensive to the sensibilities of anyone.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat surprised at the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] talking about nonpartisanship and nonpartisan activity in Congress. Why, the gentlemen have seen proper to attack the Fuel Administrator. Here is this great Democratic President, Mr. Wilson, now at the helm of this Government, doing the best thing for this Nation. He went into the Republican Party to find a fuel administrator, and he did not take a Republican from the simple life, but he took one of the royal blood, a son of an ex-President of the United States, yea, the son of the lamented Garfield, and he put him in the Democratic councils as the Fuel Administrator for the honest people of the United States of America. This same Republican held a high position under the distinguished Republican President Mr. Taft when he occupied the White House, and, forsooth, because he received this position through a Democratic President, in this great crisis the Republicans on this floor see proper to take him to task and hamper him with caustic criticism.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will get his history on straight. This gentleman, Dr. Garfield, never held any position under President Taft, and the gentleman ought not to charge Mr. Taft with that.

Mr. QUIN. My information is that the gentleman was Commissioner of Corporations under Mr. Taft.

Mr. MEEKER. Oh, no; that was another Garfield.

Mr. FESS. This is his brother.

Mr. QUIN. His brother? Well, he is still in good Republican society; but that does not even keep the gentlemen on that side from attacking him or from keeping our partisan friends from talking about nonpartisanship while in the very act of caustic partisan criticism.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I have not the time to yield. I want to say further that President Garfield's son, in this critical hour under President Wilson, is endeavoring to relieve one of the greatest and, I might say, the most severe calamities that has arisen in this country in many a year. Gentlemen object to his having power to stop, perhaps, certain corporations who need not run for one day in the week, forsooth, in order that the poor, shivering children of this country might not be without coal. Do you propose to let that class of corporations continue to burn coal seven days in the week while all classes of people in the cities are freezing because they can not get coal at any price? Do you know that right in this city, when the thermometer was 8 degrees below zero, I saw a line down here at the coal yards, a drove of poor people 300 yards long, waiting to get 1 bushel of coal each, for which they paid an enormous price? I stood there, in company with my wife, and waited for four hours endeavoring to buy some coal, and after getting the coal I had to hire an outside truck to haul the coal to my home, where we had not had a lump of coal, except a basketful a day, for five days. Those poor people were suffering, contracting rheumatism and pneumonia, because of the lack of coal to put in their stoves and furnaces to get the necessary heat to keep death from coming to them, and yet you object to the Fuel Administrator of this Republic protecting the people of this country from freezing to death through lack of coal! Is that all? The gentleman went further and attacked the Food Administrator. It seems that the President of the United States can have no man in authority that pleases you. Is it possible that these gentlemen who are at the head of these great positions can make no mistakes? I wondered, when the gentleman was making his long 40-minute speech about the thousands of cars all over this country, what he would do if he were the President of the United States. Why did he not suggest something for Dr. Garfield to do? Why did he not suggest something for Mr. Hoover to do? Why is it that these faultfinders, these people that want the poor people of the United States to freeze to death with the thermometer away below zero, finding fault with Dr. Garfield because he is blazing out a way to supply coal to the homes of all the people, finding fault with Mr. Hoover because he is trying to keep the price of food down, do not offer any remedy?

Why do you not take your faultfinding to Mr. Hoover and to Dr. Garfield and point out a definite way by which they can run this business so that all of the industries of this country could keep running every day, and at the same time every home would have plenty of coal and nobody suffer; but you do not do that; you stand on this floor and talk so that the newspapers of the country can get it and carry your criticisms to the public and sow the seeds of discontent and dissatisfaction. And another thing. The President appointed these two gentlemen, and they are acting under his orders, under the powers Congress vested by law in the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. QUIN. These ships must have coal to carry the supplies to the soldiers that you are talking about. Do you not think you had better let the President continue to handle this business? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. QUIN. I thank you.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8696, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Young, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 6176. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have not any desire to be an obstructionist. I did object to this unanimous request this morning in order to call attention to a situation which has arisen here on Calendar Wednesday. If it is allowed to continue, it is going to stop consideration of all bills reported after December 12. I do not want to delay public business, but unless some method is devised to cure that situation I do not think any more unanimous-consent motions regarding legislation ought to be agreed to during this session even covering the Unanimous Consent Calendar. I do not intend to object at this time, but I think it is up to the leaders on both sides of the House to cure that situation. For the present I do not intend to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, let me make a statement in regard to the matter about which the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] has made a statement. I think myself that the order ought to be vacated. It was not the intention of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the author of the bill, nor myself in preferring the unanimous-consent request——

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. In a moment.

Mr. LONDON. Why should not the gentleman make the request now?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to make it when I make the statement—that that bill should take precedence over any bill, but the only request made and intended to be made was to this effect: That that bill should be in order on Calendar Wednesday when the bills then on the calendar should be disposed of. It was the intention only to affect that bill and give that bill a status which the order was intended to give, not that the bill should take precedence over any bill that should be put on the calendar thereafter. That was not the intention of the order, although it might have been worked differently so as to effect the real intention. I now ask unanimous consent that that order be vacated.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina that that order ought to be vacated, but I do not think it is fair to the House to do so with such a small gathering as there is to-night, as there may be others who are interested, and I think it is only fair it should be taken up at some time when there is a fuller attendance, and I certainly will not object.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then I will make the request to-morrow.

Mr. HAYDEN. I would like to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that, as the author of the bill, having the matter in charge, I am convinced that the order ought to be vacated, and I am the only one interested——

Mr. GILLETT. No; the other day the question arose as to whether the gentleman was the only one interested. The whole House is interested.

Mr. NOLAN. May I suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that when he does make the request he include in that request that the Committee on Labor have a time to consider the bill they were deprived of by the point of order yesterday. I think it is only fair that, inasmuch as this is intended to cure a situation, that the Committee on Labor should be given their day in court, of which they were deprived when the point of order was made yesterday.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that there is an element of fairness in that, but I think we had better get through vacating the order first.

Mr. NOLAN. I call attention to this fact, that if you do not do that you do an injustice to a committee that had a bill on the calendar about to be considered, and that probably will not be reached for a long time to come. The Committee of Labor is an important committee of this House which gives consideration to measures which come before it, just as every other committee; and one bill they reported out unanimously the enacting clause was stricken out, and another bill, to which we gave a great deal of attention in the last Congress and some attention to in this, we were deprived of an opportunity to put before this House by the point of order; and I think, in all fairness, that the unanimous-consent agreement ought to have coupled with it an agreement to give the Committee on Labor their day in court.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is——

Mr. KITCHIN. Did we get consent, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that request now for the present, and I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman withdraw his request that the House meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock?

Mr. KITCHIN. That has been put, and the House agreed to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] reserved the right to object to that request.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. It is very easily settled. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 18, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURRY of California: Petition of the Salmon Packers of Alaska, the Alaska Fisherman's Union, and other affiliated organizations, for the establishment of a Government hospital in the Bristol Bay region of Alaska, in the vicinity of the mouth of the Nushagak River; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, petition of the California Cattleman's Association, to conserve cattle suffering through lack of food by throwing open the park lands of the public domain for use as grazing lands; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Memorial of the National Association of Printing Ink Makers, requesting that sufficient shipping facilities be provided that the ink makers may not have to go out of business, and protesting against official indifference to their requests; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of Irish Progressive League, favoring full freedom for Ireland; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DARROW: Resolution of the Select and Common Councils of Philadelphia, Pa., protesting against the abolition of the pneumatic mail tubes in the city of Philadelphia; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of Tufts College Publishing Association, favoring repeal of the second-class postage provisions of the war-revenue act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: Resolution of Rotary Club, of Providence, R. I., favoring passage of the Chamberlain universal military service bill; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Memorial of the W. S. Rosecrans Post, No. 182, of the Department of California and Nevada, Grand Army of the Republic, urging increase in pensions of veterans of the Civil War; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SNYDER: Petition of D. B. Simmons & Co., the D. D. Winston Co., Field & Start, the Williams Co., and E. S. Demsky, all of Utica, N. Y., against forcing the placing of contracts with the American Sugar Refining Co., etc.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 18, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we would be more and more impressed with the tremendous fact that we are the representatives of a Christian civilization. We stand for Thy name founded upon Thy law and our purpose is to execute Thy will. Do Thou look upon us this day and guide us in every thought and purpose and passion of our hearts, that all things may be done to the honor and glory of Thy Name and to the advancement of all the interests of this great Christian Nation. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF FUEL ADMINISTRATOR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the resolution of the Senate of yesterday was presented to the Fuel Administrator of the United States by the Secretary of the Senate at 6.35 o'clock the Fuel Administrator requested the Secretary to notify the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the Presiding Officer to notify the Senate that the order had gone into effect at 5.45 o'clock, before the receipt of the resolution, and that no discourtesy was intended to the Senate by such action.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I feel privileged to say that while the resolution of the Senate was not formally presented in writing to the Fuel Administrator until 6.30 o'clock, it was telephoned to him as early as 6 o'clock, and that he had every opportunity of knowing even before that time that the Senate was about to pass it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to have placed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. Garfield touching the coal controversy. The letter will not be read, unless some Senator desires it read, but will go in the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the letter be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES FUEL ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1918.

To the VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: Permit me to confirm the message which I sent to you yesterday afternoon by Mr. Baker, the Secretary of the Senate.

It is my earnest desire that the Members of the Senate should know that, as an executive officer of the Government, I would not willingly treat a request of the Senate with other than the greatest respect.

The order suspending the operation of industrial plants in portions of the United States was issued only after deliberate consideration, and will, I firmly believe, aid effectively in providing coal for domestic consumers, for the prompt bunkering of ships carrying necessary war material abroad, and for the relief of the serious congestion at the docks and at many points in the section covered by the order. I still believe it should stand. To delay the application of the order would only add to the congestion. It would be but natural that industry, in the interval, would redouble its efforts to increase supplies on hand.

To permit factories with a coal supply to operate during the period of suspension would allow many producing articles least essential to the war to continue, while some producing articles the most essential would be compelled to shut down. Moreover, continued production by those well supplied with coal would delay, if not defeat, the relief contemplated by the order.

I should add that the resolution was presented to me at 6.35 p. m. yesterday afternoon and that the order was signed at 5.45. With high respect, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

H. A. GARFIELD,
United States Fuel Administrator.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a certified copy of a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Virginia ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for national prohibition, which will be placed on the files of the Senate.

PATRIOTIC CABLEGRAM FROM ST. THOMAS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following cablegram, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

ST. THOMAS, January 17, 1918.

PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington:

The executive committee in charge of celebrations commemorating this day on behalf of those accepting citizenship in the United States solemnly pledge their loyalty to the United States, being fully conscious of and duly appreciating the great benefits of American citizenship, and beg to assure the Government of their true and faithful allegiance.

BALDEMAR MILLER, Chairman.

VISITORS TO NAVAL ACADEMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In accordance with the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, providing for the appointment of a Board of Visitors at the Naval Academy, which act provided that the presiding officer of the Senate shall appoint four Senators upon the Board of Visitors during the month of January of each year, the Chair appoints on such Board of Visitors for the year 1918 the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I present a large number of telegrams, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS, January 17, 1918.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Undersigned committee was appointed at meeting of New England Transportation Conference, which included representatives of Boston Chamber of Commerce, Associated Industries of Massachusetts, New England Shoe & Leather Association, the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, Paper Manufacturers of New England, and Boston Trade Association; Arkwright Club of New England and Paint and Oil Club of New England, and other manufacturers. The conference recognizes serious shortage of fuel but feels that order of National Fuel Administrator will work unnecessarily great harm to labor and industry. All the submarines in the world could not sink in the same length of time the amount of supplies which will be killed by it if literally carried out. Millions of dollars of unnecessary damage will be caused in interference with production and destruction of goods in progress. Same result could better be obtained by stating percentage of fuel each industry must conserve and allowing industry to make that conservation under regulation of New England fuel administrator in such manner as will do least injury to business and keep the greatest number of employees at work. We object to the five-day shut down as a poor way to accomplish object sought, and we especially object to shortness of the notice which does not give industrial plants opportunity to rearrange their schedules. New England has in its fuel administrator a man who has made very careful and continuous study of the necessities of the occasion. We believe that Mr. Storrow should be given great authority and latitude to determine how coal which must be saved in New England shall be saved. Shortage of fuel in New England is largely due to interference with water transportation. Under ordinary conditions 60 per cent of our coal is brought by water. We do not object to United States taking vessels absolutely required for war purposes, but some of the vessels could be spared at least temporarily to relieve the present situation. The more boats that haul coal to New England the more cars and locomotives there will be free to haul coal to other parts of the country and the more war goods New England and the other parts of the country will produce. We, like good soldiers, will obey the order and live up to its spirit until it is either modified or rescinded. We do, however, protest against peremptory form of order and unnecessary hardship which it entails. Thousands of employees will lose an unnecessary amount in wages at a time when they can least afford it. We urge that Federal Fuel Administrator inform New England administrator amount of coal which must be saved in New England, and that it then be left to New England fuel administrator to order that saving in such way as may seem to him wise.

Committee of New England's Transportation Conference—

BROCKTON, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

Under the auspices of the Brockton Chamber of Commerce; William L. Gleason, mayor of the city of Brockton; members of the Shoe Manufacturers' Association of Brockton; Brockton Central Labor Union; and Brockton Shoe Council, in representative conference assembled, protest against the closing of the Brockton shoe factories and other industries, (1) because the order does not obtain the end desired in the conservation of coal, for the reason that all factories, whether working or not, are obliged to maintain a temperature sufficient to prevent the chilling and destruction of the materials used in the manufacture of shoes, such as blackings, dressing leather, etc.; (2) because the operation of the majority of all the shoe factories in the Brockton district, comprising Brockton and the surrounding towns, is not by coal direct, but by the medium of the central electric station, which is exempted by the order of the local board; (3) because this order is imperative for the closing of the factories, regardless of the possibility that they could be run by other fuel; (4) because the wage earners of Brockton gladly assumed a certain responsibility to pay for liberty bonds by installments from their weekly wage; the loss of the days' work consequent upon the operation of this order will make it impossible, in many cases, for them to meet their obligations; (5) because, while the ultimate end to be obtained by the order is the protection of health and life, the immediate effect is to bring direct suffering to many of the 14,000 operatives in the factories, who are thus forced to find in their homes the heat which they are accustomed to find in the factory, and by losing the days' work are impoverished to the extent, in many cases, of inability to pay the price for fuel, even if they could obtain it.

Wm. L. Gleason, mayor of Brockton; Preston B. Keith Shoe Co.; Churchill & Ald. N. Ma. Co.; Whitman & Keith; E. E. Taylor Co.; T. D. Barry Co.; Brockton Heel Co.; Sterling Motor Car Co.; Brockton Central Labor Union; Brockton Shoe Council; Brockton Chamber of Commerce, E. C. Jewett, ex-secretary.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, January 17, 1918.

Hon. HENRY C. LODGE,
Official Building, Washington, D. C.:

As one of your constituents, I respectfully urge you to protest against the policy which has permitted and continued to permit the use of coal for such nonessential purposes as display advertising, manufacture of pianos, talking machines, jewelry, and beer, and for overheating theaters and dance halls and the like, and now forbids its use for five consecutive days immediately, and for one or two days every week for some time to come, for all manufactures, even that of our most essential war needs. Can we not now at least stop entirely all unessential uses of fuel, and, if necessary, limit the amount of heating, even in homes, and require that essential war work be pushed seven days every week?

F. A. EUSTIS.

BOSTON, MASS., January 17, 1918.

HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

The city of Boston Hotel Association earnestly requests your influence and immediate action to exempt hotels on Garfield order, which unnecessarily curtails our business and practically amounts to persecution.

A. E. HURLBURT, President.

BOSTON, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

Absolutely impossible for manufacturing plants to comply with coal order. Plant heated with exhaust steam. Unless heated, entire sprinkler system will freeze. In country town; inadequate fire forces. To obtain exhaust steam, boilers must be run and engines turned over with limited power. In this plant employees subscribed $15,000 in liberty bonds. This impossible of new loan if employees are cut down in working hours. Would suggest each manufacturer required to save definite amount of coal during next three months and given license to operate after satisfaction that saving will be made.

STANDARD WOVEN FABRIC CO.,
STOUGHTON BELL, President.

LYNN, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

The Essex County (Mass.) Associated Boards of Trade protest through you against the Garfield fuel order for our people to put in five days working for the Kaiser. We believe the Fuel Administration has been incompetent and visionless from the very first. Garfield evidently thinks he is granting some college boys a week's vacation. He can have no appreciation of what this latest so-called fuel order really means. This action proves him to be totally unfit to take any part in national affairs at any time. His plain duty from the start was to greatly increase the activities of coal mines and railroads when the weather was good instead of permitting conditions that will decrease the activities of an entire nation.

RALPH H. BAUER,
Chairman Legislative Committee.

BOSTON, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

With intent of full cooperation with Government and realizing the necessity of Dr. Garfield's drastic closing order, yet we respectfully request that you file protest in our behalf on the suddenness of same and, if possible, have effective date delayed until Monday or Tuesday next to permit preparation to comply with order, to avoid serious loss on the part of our members.

National Building Granite Quarries Association (Inc.); Granite Paving Block Manufacturers' Association of the United States (Inc.); The National Association of the Granite Industries of the United States (Inc.).

NEW YORK, January 17, 1918.

Hon. HENRY C. LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

Our mills in your State have substantial Government orders. Garfield's drastic order seriously affects the ability of the company to make deliveries of cloth to the Army. We strenuously oppose the order and appeal to you to remedy this national catastrophe.

WM. M. WOOD,
President American Woolen Co.

BOSTON, MASS., January 18, 1918.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Allow me most respectfully to urge you to do everything in your power to get the closing-down order rescinded. Personally it does not affect me as I am practically out of business, but I regard it as one of the most serious and disastrous things that could be done.

H. W. MONTAGUE.

BOSTON, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

To meet this pressing coal-shortage emergency I would suggest that retail stores, office buildings, and other lines of trade, which come into the Monday-holiday class, be allowed to change from an all-day Monday holiday to a five-hour day Tuesdays and Fridays; opening for business at 10 a. m. and closing at 3 p. m. This procedure would accomplish as much in conservation of coal and give all classes of business coming within this rule an opportunity to transact all necessary public business and would accommodate the needs of many lines, which would be better handled this way than by a full holiday once a week for 10 weeks. The five hours a day of business will heat the buildings sufficiently to protect sprinkler systems and other water pipings. Two days of no heat in severe cold weather would freeze up seriously nineteen out of twenty buildings, causing millions of dollars' worth of loss and inconvenience. These hours would apply equally advantageously to manufacturing and other trades.

P. MAGRANE,
President Magrane-Houston Co.

BOSTON, MASS., January 18, 1918.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

We can not win the war by loafing. We hereby register our protest against the Monday-closing order and request that you use your efforts to have this order rescinded.

H. H. CHANDLER & SON.

WORCESTER, MASS., January 17, 1918.

HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washingon, D. C.:

We protest against the action of the Fuel Administration in shutting down our industry. This action will cause serious industrial disturbance and untold suffering among our people. We would suggest that a radical curtailment of all other freight and passenger service and devoting entire transportation facilities to movement of coal for the next five days will accomplish much better results.

WORCESTER MANUFACTURING CO.

NEW YORK, January 17, 1918.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:
In behalf of the New England mills of Amory Browne & Co., and also in behalf of our two mills in Alabama, I wish to protest against action of Director Garfield owing to losses on material in process. Impossible to follow orders strictly.

WALTER C. BAYLIES.

LOWELL, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:
Wicked waste to stop portion of mill operated by water. Eighty per cent in poundage of our contracts is for Government. Using water power would not involve use of coal. With mill closed, must use coal to protect sprinklers. With mill running, part of such coal is generally saved, because of heat from machinery being adequate for sprinklers and employees' comfort. Hope administrator will confirm our assumption that we may run by water on Government work, where consumption of coal is not involved.

F. A. FLATHER,
Treasurer Boot Mills.

BOSTON, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:
New England shoe manufacturers and tanners, while desiring to do their full duty toward the Government as patriotic citizens, are greatly disturbed over the order of the Fuel Administrator in shutting down all manufacturing establishments for the next five days and our association has been all day receiving strong protests against Mr. Garfield's action. This drastic order comes at a most unfortunate time for our shoe industry and we urge you to have the regulations modified in any way possible in the interests of both manufacturers and their employees.

NEW ENGLAND SHOE AND LEATHER ASSOCIATION, THOMAS F. ANDERSON, Secretary.

BOSTON, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Hon. H. C. LODGE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:
I wish to enter my protest against the closing order of Dr. Garfield. Textile mills are heated by exhaust steam, which is so helped by the friction of machinery running that the saving of coal will be comparatively small when the mills are closed.

C. MINOT WELD.

NEW YORK, January 17, 1918.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:
I protest against fuel-conservation edict as being extremely injurious to all industries.

FRANCIS U. STEARNS.
Treasurer Renfrew Manufacturing Co., Adams, Mass.

WORCESTER, MASS., January 17, 1918.

HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:
We protest most emphatically against order issued by Fuel Administration, which we consider a serious blunder. We respectfully urge you to do all possible to have reconsidered and revoked this step with its resulting demoralization to industry. We recommend that closer attention be given to movement of coal now sidetracked and that present movement of freight and passenger service be radically curtailed to accomplish this, and that positions of great responsibility should be filled by men of proven business ability.

GRATON & KNIGHT.

SOMERVILLE, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:
We vigorously protest against ruling closing business places and factories unless absolutely necessary. It will mean utter ruin to many merchants in this section as well as terrible suffering owing to loss of pay among the people. Can not ruling be modified?

TEELE SQUARE BUSINESS MEN.

EASTHAMPTON, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:
Fuel order appearing in newspapers this morning will, to our mind, work unnecessary hardship on labor and will seriously handicap all business connected with the furnishing to the Government of materials urgently needed for the successful prosecution of the war. Industries having fuel in ample supply should not be handicapped in producing materials urgently needed by the Government. The order we think is unnecessarily drastic and will lead to business disaster in many directions and general unrest throughout the industrial centers.

Hon. H. C. LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:
The immediate adoption of daylight hours for general manufacturing will effect as much saving as shutting down every Monday, and with no consequent embarrassment to labor or manufacturer. What we need is more production. Our own plant is heated by exhaust steam when running, and consequently takes two-thirds as much coal for heating while shut down as is used when running full. Feel present ruling will have far-reaching effect in causing further labor disturbances.

The Patriotic League of Lenawee County, embracing all patriotic activities in the county, most earnestly protests against any congressional action designed to coerce or interfere with executive measures dealing with fuel and transportation. Such measures are absolutely an executive function, and interference from Congress would create a grave political crisis, which we should view with profound apprehension. For Congress to usurp executive powers in war would bring inevitable disaster. We are at the parting of the ways. Our Constitution and system of government are at stake. This community supports the President absolutely in his constitutional power and considers all resistance to Garfield's order as unpatriotic and extremely dangerous, irrespective of the merit or advisability of the order itself.

Published copy of Garfield order allows schools, theaters, saloons, and many nonessentials to run, but prevents our plant, which is operating on war munitions exclusively, from furnishing necessary war materials according to contract schedule. This partial stoppage of work throws men out of employment, which means great suffering among their families, which could be partially relieved by stopping all nonessentials. Schools could make up time later. Something to eat and wear for men's families and war material for the Government are of more importance at this time than are all the amusement places, clubs, and saloons in the country. If the question of throwing men out of employment is to be considered, the producers should be given preference. We have been aiding some of our 800 employees to get fuel, but can not continue if the Government takes this course. We feel we can count on your aid to have this order changed to insure necessary production.

DETROIT, MICH., January 17, 1918.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Newspaper report of proposed Fuel Administration order to close industries was a distinct shock to Detroit. At a meeting called by the Detroit Board of Commerce, representing the majority of large manufacturers, it was the unanimous opinion that an emphatic protest should be made against the issuance of such an order as is proposed, on the ground that it would be a national calamity and would invite disaster rather than avert it. Approximately $1,000,000 per day will be taken from 225,000 workmen in Detroit. Seventy-five per cent of coal is necessary for heating purposes alone to protect plants even if closed down, and net saving would be very small. The following are concrete examples: Woodworking plants require more coal when idle than when running, because the waste is used for fuel. One printing establishment, illustrative of many others, uses three-quarters of a ton of coal and $4 worth of electricity per day to keep 65 employees at work. The throwing of millions of men on the streets without occupation will present most fertile field for anarchistic and pro-German agitators. Wage earners will not understand why they are thrown out of work and will be disappointed at not receiving the suggested pay, which very few, if any, manufacturers can give. Dissatisfaction will result, followed by objection to continuing the war. The order will do more to bring about a demand for peace without victory than anything which can possibly be done and will bring joy to the Kaiser and his sympathizers here. We are not thinking of Detroit alone, but what we have said applies to all manufacturing sections of the country. We pledge ourselves to do everything possible to conserve coal by eliminating unnecessary lighting and heating in factories, homes, and streets, and solicit definite suggestions from the Fuel Administration toward this end. We protest most vigorously against shutting down the industries in this country, causing a delay in producing, which means a loss of thousands of lives on the firing line.

A. A. TEMPLETON,
President Detroit Board of Commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a large number of telegrams relative to the order issued by the Fuel Administrator, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

BOSTON, January 18, 1918.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,

This association makes a most emphatic protest against Garfield order closing business. Owing to the criminal neglect of Car Commissioner Judge Lovett and other Washington bureaus to allow necessary raw materials, we have no reserve stock of printing ink in any of our factories. If our plants are arbitrarily closed, it will shut up every newspaper and every other publication and every printer in the Eastern States for weeks. We have begged in vain for relief for an uncalled-for, intolerable, and inexcusable condition. Washington officials have ignored the situation and treated us with discourteous neglect. We must have immediate assurance that our mills can run and that we get raw material, or we will necessarily stop every ounce of ink going into the District of Columbia.

The conference recognizes serious shortage of fuel, but feels that order of National Fuel Administrator will work unnecessarily great harm to labor and industry. All the submarines in the world could not sink in the same length of time the amount of supplies which will be killed by it if literally carried out. Millions of dollars of unnecessary damage will be caused in interference with production and destruction of goods in process. Same result could be better obtained by stating percentage of fuel each industry must conserve and allowing industry to make that conservation under regulation of New England fuel administrator in such manner as will do least injury to business and keep the greatest number of employees at work. We object to the five-day shutdown as a poor way to accomplishing object sought, and we especially object to shortness of the notice, which does not give industrial plants opportunity to rearrange their schedules. New England has in its fuel administrator a man who has made very careful and continuous study of the necessities of the occasion. We believe that Mr. Storrow should be given great authority and latitude to determine how coal which must be saved in New England shall be saved. Shortage of fuel in New England is largely due to interference with water transportation. Under ordinary conditions 60 per cent of our coal is brought by water. We do not object to United States taking vessels absolutely required for war purposes, but some of the vessels could be spared, at least temporarily, to relieve the present situation. The more boats that haul coal to New England the more cars and locomotives there will be free to haul coal to other parts of the country and the more war goods New England and the other parts of the country will produce. We, like good soldiers, will obey the order and live up to its spirit until it is either modified or rescinded. We do, however, protest against peremptory form of order and unnecessary hardship which it entails. Thousands of employees will lose an unnecessary amount in wages at a time when they can least afford it. We urge that Federal Fuel Administrator inform New England administrator amount of coal which must be saved in New England, and that it then be left to New England fuel administrator to order that saving in such way as may seem to him wise.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I thought my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] had presented, among others, a telegram in the nature of a memorial to the Senate from Dodge Bros., at Detroit, but he has just advised me that he has not his copy of the telegram with him, and I desire to read this telegram, which deals with the cause of this trouble as well as the effect. It is very brief:

DETROIT, MICH., January 17, 1918.

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

Dodge Bros. and 17,000 of their employees most vigorously protest against the action of the administration in ordering suspension of all industries for 14 days. This order will work untold hardship and suffering, as men without money will not only have to do without coal, but will also have to do without food. In our opinion the lack of coal is entirely due to the advice spread broadcast during the early summer by Fuel Administration that later on there would be ample coal delivered at a low Government price, causing practically everyone to delay the purchasing of their coal until fall, with the result that the railroads were asked to deliver in two months coal that ordinarily required seven months to deliver. In our case it also means a delay of 14 days in the delivery of important ordnance material, which no doubt will very much please our enemies, both home and abroad.

DODGE BROS.

If I may, I desire to trespass a moment longer to read a telegram from the Genesee County fuel administrator at Flint, Mich., who says:

FLINT, MICH., January 10, 1918.

Hon. WM. ALDEN SMITH,
Grand Rapids, Mich.:

Susquehanna Coal Co., large anthracite shippers, notify Michigan dealers to-day that the Government has prohibited all their anthracite shipments coming into Michigan for 30 days. Fuel administration of Ohio has had shipments of bituminous coal from Ohio to Michigan embargoed since December 24, and Ohio miners advise by long distance that it is still on. It is up to you and other Michigan Representatives to have these conditions modified at once so this whole State may be relieved.

GENESEE COUNTY FUEL ADMINISTRATOR KELLER.

Mr. President, I have just returned after a rather enforced absence of several days. I know how deplorable and pitiable the fuel situation is in Michigan, and I can not resist the temptation to beg of my colleagues that some remedy should be afforded. When hospitals are unable to be kept warm for the purpose of caring for the sick and the dying and cries of distress can be heard everywhere it is a serious situation in a State where the thermometer is below zero. Promises and good intentions have little effect in a situation so critical.

All this chaos and disorder and lack of coordination and lack of practical cohesion are shameful. The Senate and House of Representatives should rise and if necessary clip the wings of this ominous bird; we should stay the hands of those who seek to exercise unconstitutional authority which could not and was never pretended to be given. The whole country is aghast. Our enemies must be jubilant. May I not with the highest respect for the coordinate departments of the Government beg my colleagues that some united action shall be taken to speed relief and stay this blow so serious and so far-reaching now about to fall upon our countrymen? We must be loyal to our Commander in Chief, but this does not mean that we shall be deaf or speechless, heartless or blind. Is there no cure for this inexcusable disorder?

I also have received a telegram from the president of the Board of Commerce of Detroit, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., January 17, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

A. A. TEMPLETON,
President Detroit Board of Commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I send to the desk six telegrams from as many large manufacturing plants that I have received from Columbus, Ga., one of which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

COLUMBUS, GA., January 11, 1918.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

This cotton mill is operated solely by power derived from water power. Fuel is used only for heating purposes. It is necessary to heat the buildings to keep pipes and fire-sprinkler equipment from freezing, and thereby maintain adequate fire protection. Under normal conditions heat is maintained on Sundays. Heat for this purpose will be sufficient to keep operatives warm. Seven hundred operatives are employed in this plant on daily wages. Such operatives would be caused severe suffering if this plant was closed. Operatives would suffer more from cold if plant was closed than if plant operated. Fuel would not be conserved if plant closed, because operatives would burn far more fuel at home than plant would. This plant has a supply of coal on hand for heating purposes. We urge you to take immediate action to secure modification of Garfield's order to permit us to use our own coal to heat the plant, and thereby conserve fuel, keep our operatives warm, prevent great suffering to hundreds of people, and irreparable damage to persons and property. Plant is also operating largely on Government orders. Prompt action is necessary. This entire community is affected. Advise us as soon as possible. Answer collect.

F. B. GORDON,
President Columbus Manufacturing Co.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall not ask that the other five telegrams be read. They are practically to the same effect. They vary as to the number of employees. The total number of employees of the six plants is something over 5,000. Each telegram points out that a large portion of the product of the mill from which it comes is being manufactured on Government account, and to a considerable extent will go to camps where soldiers are now stationed, and where other soldiers are to be stationed. They are manufacturing clothing and blankets for our soldiers.

These plants are run by electricity from water power. They consume no coal except for heat.

I also send to the desk a letter which I have received from Mr. Garfield, and ask that it be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES FUEL ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1918.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SMITH: Answering the inquiry by your secretary, Mr. Johnson, I take pleasure in advising you that in reply to a telegram from the Macon News, relative to our order of January 16, our ruling does not apply to newspapers or industries operated by the use of hydroelectric power.

The Macon News, therefore, if operated entirely by hydroelectric power, is not affected by the order.

Yours, very truly,

H. A. GARFIELD,
United States Fuel Administrator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say that I hope the suggestion contained in this letter is to be liberally carried out and that there will be no effort by the Fuel Administrator to cause trouble to hydroelectric plants, where there is simply a little coal used in the plants to prevent the freezing of their various instrumentalities, including the men and women who work in them.

Most of those plants have sprinkler systems all over their building that must be kept from freezing by some heat, or else they would be likely to freeze and burst, to their great damage and to the damage of the property.

In this connection I wish also to express the hope that if the Fuel Administrator does not respond to the resolution passed by the Senate he at least will so modify in its operation his order as to save the great and unnecessary loss which it otherwise is likely to cause.

I send to the desk three additional telegrams which I desire to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection. The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., January 17, 1918.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Talking to hundreds of your friends to-day, we feel the President's orders on coal are too drastic and uncalled for, and show weakness of the administration as well as of the country. Will work great hardship upon the poor, and we feel will cause the greatest wave of crime that has ever swept over this country. Should either be rescinded or modified.

ERNEST L. RHODES.

ATLANTA, GA., January 17, 1918.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The executive committee of the Atlanta Association of Credit Men, while feeling in complete accord with the purposes of the order regarding the closing of manufacturing and business houses issued by the administration, desire to express the hope that some modification of the order will be made which will bring about the necessary conservation of fuel without working the hardship which will necessarily result from the inflexible enforcement of the present order.

H. D. CARTER, President.

ATLANTA, GA., January 17, 1918.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Our mill, Millstead Manufacturing Co., Conyers, Ga., running over 50 per cent on direct Government contract. Please wire me here, expense, earliest practicable moment, latest developments shutting-down order Fuel Administration—whether or not such plants will definitely close down beginning to-morrow.

T. T. CALLAWAY, Manager.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to say that it was impossible satisfactorily to answer these telegrams last night, because the order of the Fuel Administrator was not published until this morning. I find that the Fuel Administrator was largely influenced to issue the order by the desire to put coal in the vessels which were loaded and lacking coal. I only wish to express the hope that he may still find that by moving the cars out of the terminals between his coal cars and the boats he can have the boats loaded with coal and permit them to sail rather than to stop factories which are 700 miles away from the seaports where the congested terminals interfere with coal delivery.

If he will limit interference with industries to those which affect his ship loading, he can greatly modify his order.

Mr. BECKHAM. I present a telegram from the Board of Trade of Louisville, Ky., which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., January 18, 1918.

Hon. J. C. W. BECKHAM,
Washington, D. C.:

The members of the Louisville Board of Trade, at a mass meeting held to-day, adopted a resolution heartily indorsing the purpose of the President and the Federal Fuel Administrator in conserving the coal supply of the country and offer our hearty cooperation to the Fuel Administration in its efforts in this direction.

LOUISVILLE BOARD OF TRADE,
W. S. MORROW, Secretary.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have here a telegram in relation to the subject matter the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has just spoken upon, which I should like to have read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

UNION, S. C., January 17, 1918.

Senator B. R. TILLMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Have wired Federal Fuel Administration, Washington, as follows:

"Lockhart Mills is operated exclusively by its own water power and is heated by wood cut principally from its own lands and will not use exceeding 2 tons of coal per day. Nearly 600 operatives dependent on mills for daily bread. The amount of coal used would not alone heat mills from freezing. Are we permitted to run or must we close under your order? Wire quickly."

Please, can you help us secure early instructions? Please wire me quickly.

EMSLIE NICHOLSON, Treasurer.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have been unable to answer that telegram for the reason that I could not get in touch with Fuel Administrator Garfield this morning. He was in conference with some one and has not been able to answer. I will take the responsibility of wiring the sender of the telegram that the order does not apply to such mills as his, and I hope Mr. Garfield will see that I am not bothered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I present, and desire to have inserted in the RECORD without reading, a number of telegrams from important industries in the State of Connecticut protesting against the so-called fuel order.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. F. B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

"Resolved, That the members of the Stamford Manufacturers' Association, by unanimous vote, protest most earnestly against the order closing industries from January 18, as published in the press of January 17, issued by the Hon. H. A. Garfield, Fuel Administrator. They consider the proposition as arbitrary, dictatorial, and unconstitutional; and be it further

With full realization of the suffering and loss to follow the enforcement of the order to shut down industries, the leaders in manufacturing and commerce assembled in this city strongly protest measures of Fuel Administration which will result in tremendous loss, hardship, and civic danger. Do all possible to rescind or modify.

We advocate supplanting present Fuel Administrator with an executive and business man of national standing, eliminating present controlling influence of coal operators. Present shut down is logical consequence of series of piddling blunders, and illustrates the incumbency and lack of vision of the present Fuel Administration.

Do you realize consequences of drastic order issued by Fuel Administrator? Was this order issued after consultation and approval of experts competent to realize effect of same? Why not conserve fuel by closing down plants nonessential to the production of material necessary for the carrying on of the war? Can not conceive of greater encouragement to our enemies and greater discouragement to our allies. In my opinion it is time that Congress assumed the responsibility imposed by the Constitution of the United States.

It is our opinion that the Senate and Congress should make it their business to know that the present order is constructive and not destructive. Aside from loss to operators of $500,000 in wages the carrying out of Garfield's order would seriously jeopardize placing new loan or sale of thrift stamps in this city. Over 7,000 workmen subscribed for liberty bonds, paying in installments; and factory managers have just established sale of thrift stamps. Judgment of manufacturers here is cutting off one week's pay would permanently stop on both loans and thrift stamps, as no one would know what to expect in the future. If order is carried out, will antagonize manufacturers and workmen alike.

BOSTON, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Undersigned committee was appointed at meeting of New England Transportation Conference, which included representatives of Boston Chamber of Commerce; Associated Industries of Massachusetts; New England Shoe & Leather Association; the National Association of Wool Manufacturers; Paper Manufacturers of New England; Boston Wool Trade Association; Arkwright Club, of New England; and Paint and Oil Club of New England, and other manufacturers. The conference recognizes serious shortage of fuel, but feels that order of National Fuel Administrator will work unnecessarily great harm to labor and industry. All the submarines in the world could not sink in the same length of time the amount of supplies which will be killed by it if literally carried out. Millions of dollars of unnecessary damage will be caused in interference with production and destruction of goods in process. Same result could better be obtained by stating percentage of fuel each industry must conserve, and allowing industry to make that conservation under regulation of New England fuel administrator in such manner as will do least injury to business and keep the greatest number of employees at work. We object to the five-day shutdown as a poor way to accomplishing object sought, and we especially object to shortness of the notice, which does not give industrial plants opportunity to rearrange their schedules. New England has in its fuel administrator a man who has made very careful and continuous study of the necessities of the occasion. We believe that Mr. Storrow should be given great authority and latitude to determine how coal which must be saved in New England shall be saved. Shortage of fuel in New England is largely due to interference with water transportation. Under ordinary conditions 60 per cent of our coal is brought by water. We do not object to United States taking vessels absolutely required for war purposes, but some of the vessels could be spared, at least temporarily, to relieve the present situation. The more boats that haul coal to New England the more cars and locomotives there will be free to haul coal to other parts of the country, and the more war goods New England and the other parts of country will produce. We, like good soldiers, will obey the order and live up to its spirit until it is either modified or rescinded. We do, however, protest against peremptory form of order and unnecessary hardship which it entails. Thousands of employees will lose an unnecessary amount in wages at a time when they can least afford it. We urge that Federal Fuel Administrator inform New England administrator amount of coal which must be saved in New England, and that it then be left to New England fuel administrator to order that saving in such way as may seem to him wise.

Committee of New England Transportation Conference.

Mr. BRANDEGEE subsequently said: I ask the Secretary to read a telegram which I have received from my State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

DERBY, CONN., January 18, 1918.

Senator FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
Washington, D. C.:

The Employers Association of the Lower Naugatuck Valley, embracing Ansonia, Seymour, Derby, and Shelton, strongly urges you to have Saturday substituted for Monday on legal holiday to be declared for next 10 weeks. As order now stands our 20,000 employees will suffer immense wage loss they are in no position to meet.

P. L. GERETY, President.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, since last night I have received 30 or 40 telegrams from my own State relative to the coal situation. They come from public officials, from leading manufacturers and business men, in whose judgment I have every confidence, and who know something about the coal business. Among these telegrams is one from the Marion Steam Shovel Co., of Marion, Ohio. That company is perhaps the largest steam-shovel manufacturing plant in the world. The telegram is typical of some of the others on the same subject. I ask that it may be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

MARION, OHIO, January 17, 1918.

Senator ATLEE POMERENE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

If reported fuel administration order becomes effective causing this plant to shut down, we will require within from five to ten tons as much coal per day when shut down as when running, owing to the fact that we use exhaust steam for heating plant when running, but when shut down will necessitate using live steam for heating purposes to prevent serious damages by freezing, consequently can only effect saving of fuel as mentioned, but it will mean the throwing out of employment of approximately 1,600 men. Can there be any relief suggested?

MARION STEAM SHOVEL CO.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, many of these large manufacturing plants in Ohio have a sprinkling system for fire protection, and it is necessary to keep up the fires in order to preserve their plants even if they are not in fact operating. I have presented that telegram because it specifically points out the advantage of operation and the fact that if they are not operating they will consume almost as much coal as they do when they are operating.

I have another telegram here from the city of Springfield, Ohio, a manufacturing town, with a population of probably 40,000. It is in the gas belt of Ohio, and about one-half of the manufacturers in Springfield use gas for fuel purposes. Under the order which has been issued by the Fuel Administrator those plants must close down. I can not conceive what advantage to the coal situation could be derived from closing down these plants even for an hour.

On yesterday a representative of one of the largest rubber plants in Ohio was here. That plant employs about 22,000 people and is manufacturing, in part, war supplies, railroad supplies, and other supplies which enter intimately into the industries of the country. The vast majority of the employees of this concern subscribed to liberty bonds; many of them did so at considerable personal sacrifice, and yet they are to be thrown out of employment whether the plant employing them has coal or not. I have yet to hear anybody point out the wisdom of that course.

Mr. President, I am not going to take the time of the Senate to go into this matter. It is the most drastic order, in my judgment, that was ever issued by any department of any government and, in my judgment, with less excuse than any other order that was ever issued. I recognize the fact that we need coal for our Navy, but the Government has the power to commandeer that coal at any time it may wish to do so. I do not know that any coal for Navy purposes is taken from the Ohio mines. If they need coal for the Navy, they certainly should have it, and if they need coal from Ohio they ought to have it, but they do not take it from Ohio.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have seen it stated somewhere, and apparently with authority, that 60 per cent of the fuel used by the Navy was in the form of oil.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator is correct, at least in this, that there is a large amount of oil consumed as Navy fuel. But I am quite sure there is not any one Senator who would want to deprive the Navy of a single bushel of coal at any time. The Navy must first be served, but they have failed to show wherein they are going to better serve the Navy by depriving the manufacturers of Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and Minnesota of their coal supply. It it can be shown that it is necessary to close down every factory in Ohio in order to get fuel for the Navy, so be it, and everyone will say "amen."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. POMERENE. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not true that the Navy not only has the coal it needs but that naval officials in the city of Boston loaned to the Fuel Administrator a large amount of coal for distribution to private citizens for private consumption?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not advised as to the facts, but I accept them as the Senator states them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, I do not personally know that to be the case, but I have been so informed, and I have no doubt——

Mr. POMERENE. I have no doubt about the situation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I have no doubt that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who has carefully watched the subject, can give the Senate assurance that the Navy is fully provided with coal at every point.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, let me call attention to another significant situation. On yesterday a very prominent gentleman—I am not at liberty to name him, but he is a gentleman who is known to all the Senators here—told me about his lumber interests. He has perhaps five or six sawmills. The fuel used by those sawmills is the refuse from the logs. Some of that refuse is used for fuel purposes in the electric lighting plants in the neighborhood, and yet, under this wonderfully wise order, these sawmills are to close down on certain days and not be permitted to burn this refuse.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. POMERENE. I will yield in a moment. Mr. President, I have a telegram here from the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Toledo, Ohio, which exemplifies the situation there and speaks of their attitude. I am not going to ask the Senate that it be read, but I ask that it be incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

TOLEDO, OHIO, January 17, 1918.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of our association to-day the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That 90 per cent of the manufacturers of Toledo assembled this morning in convention and agreed to carry out Dr. Garfield's order on fuel conservation to the letter. But while Toledo realizes the necessity of conserving fuel, yet we also realize the importance of wage earners continuing their employment to obtain sufficient money to supply the necessities of life; realizing that a large percentage of the fuel used in the plants at Toledo will be necessarily used to keep the plants heated and their sprinkling and fire-protecting systems going, thereby preventing ruin of the plants, we do earnestly protest against the reported order regarding shutting down of all use of fuel for power, as provided by the order recently promulgated. The manufacturers of Toledo are willing and anxious to cooperate to their fullest extent with the requirements of the Government for those things that are found to be necessary in the present emergency; nevertheless they earnestly insist that they believe the situation will be made worse instead of better by the shutting down of all uses of power, throwing from 50,000 to 60,000 of Toledo employees out of employment and out of receiving their customary wage. The reported suggestion by the newspapers that manufacturers pay employees full wages during the shutdown is a very serious matter, as business conditions and present high labor wages make profits so small that in the ordinary case this would be impossible. Many of the plants of Toledo receive their power from the Toledo railways and light company, and some of them use not to exceed 10 per cent of the fuel used in the plants for power, the balance being necessary to keep up the physical condition of the plant. We believe it is necessary for the wage earners to obtain fuel for their bodies as well as for their houses, and this can not be done unless they are able to get their wages to pay the high prices for food, which are now necessary. We therefore earnestly protest against this wholesale order and urge that a study be made immediately and the order be limited just as far as possible and practical.

MERCHANTS & MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF TOLEDO.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi, who was about to ask me a question.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was about to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that, in justice to Dr. Garfield, it ought to be stated that the coal is not to be used, and he does not propose to use it for the Navy. It is the transports that he is so solicitous about serving and providing with coal. Nothing is said, I think, in his order about furnishing coal to the Navy, but it is needed for the transports that are now lying in port for lack of coal, which are needed to carry freight to our allies.

Mr. POMERENE. The transports are part of the Navy, as I understand.

Mr. VARDAMAN. They are not at all a part of the Navy.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, well, I understand in regard to that. What is the use of being captious about this thing? When it comes to the matter of the transporting of freight and other supplies, it is for Navy purposes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator ought to be more careful or discriminating in his use of terms. I repeat, the order has nothing whatever to do with the Navy. I would not be understood as in any way condoning the mistake of the Fuel Administrator. As I have stated before, I think the order issued by the Fuel Administrator was an unfortunate, disastrous blunder, and its foolishness is accentuated by the fact that it was so very unnecessary. The end sought to be attained could have been reached by a different course. I endeavored to impress the Fuel Administrator with that fact, and suggested what I thought the proper way when he was before the subcommittee last evening. But this unfortunate step was determined upon, I presume, and it was taken, regardless of the horrible consequences. I think, however, it is fair to Dr. Garfield to say that the coal to be moved and released under this order is not to be used by the Navy.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if any correction is necessary, I accept it; I do not want to do anybody any injustice or to exaggerate a single fact; but, nevertheless, the fact remains that not a pound of coal will go to the moving of those transports either from the Ohio, Indiana, or Illinois fields.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That may be true; I do not doubt that at all.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall occupy the floor for only a moment.

I want to say to the Senators present who are protesting against the recent order of the Fuel Administration that I sympathize with them, and to the utmost degree. I think those of us from the Western States can perhaps do so more appreciably than those from the States now affected, because we have had several years' experience with this principle of conservation, and we have become indurated to it. I only hope that the lesson which this order will bring to the minds of the Senate will make them a little more tolerant of us when we here protest against a situation which is analogous to the one which is now under consideration and which has been the prolific source of suppressing the development of the resources of the West, which, if they had been left untrammeled, would have made it unnecessary for this order ever to have been issued.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3311) to increase and expedite the supply of munitions of war (Rept. No. 200); and

A bill (S. 3472) to authorize the Secretary of War to provide and issue distinctive buttons or badges to men drafted or volunteering for enlistment in the military forces who are exempted or rejected and to provide a penalty for unlawfully wearing, procuring, or manufacturing the same (Rept. No. 203).

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3470) to amend section 35 of the Criminal Code of the United States (Rept. No. 201); and

A bill (S. 3526) to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916 (Rept. No. 204).

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3471) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant furloughs without pay and allowances to enlisted men of the Army of the United States, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 202) thereon.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on the Library, to which were referred the following joint resolutions, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 49) authorized the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of James Buchanan, a former President of the United States (Rept. No. 205); and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 107) authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to Francis Asbury (Rept. No. 206).

COAL AND ASPHALT LANDS.

Mr. OWEN. From the Committee on Indians Affairs, I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 195) providing for the sale of the coal and asphalt deposits in the segregated mineral land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Okla., and I submit a report (No. 207) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 25, after the word "value," to insert "retaining the right to reject any or all bids."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 12, after the word "right," to insert the words "except as herein otherwise provided."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 4, page 5, line 2, to insert:

Provided further, That no person or corporation shall be permitted to acquire more than four tracts of 960 acres each, except where such person, firm, or corporation has such tracts under existing valid lease.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask from what committee that bill was reported?

Mr. OWEN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill has passed the House of Representatives, and it was unanimously reported by the Indian Affairs Committee. It has also been favorably reported upon by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator object to stating, in a word, what the bill purports to do?

Mr. OWEN. Not at all. The bill is simply carrying out the treaty made with the Choctaws and Chickasaws some years ago to dispose of the surplus coal and asphalt lands which the Government has been administering there for them for quite a long period of time. The promise was made in 1902, but the matter has been delayed from time to time and never acted on. The Interior Department desires to have these matters disposed of, so as to wind up the affairs of the Five Tribes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if the Secretary of the Interior approves of the legislation?

Mr. OWEN. He does. He has made a favorable report on it, which I have incorporated in the report of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. And the amendments which are offered now are the amendments suggested by the department?

Mr. OWEN. They are amendments that do not interfere at all with the proposed policy of the bill. They are simply verbal changes that were found necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 5, line 10, after the word "reserved," to insert "and existing valid leases thereon."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 16, after the word "Oklahoma," to strike out all of the remainder of section 5, and in lieu thereof to insert "for the grounds of the State penitentiary: Provided, That said coal deposit under said land shall not be mined by convict labor for the purpose of sale to any private agencies, individual person, or corporation, or to be sold for private or commercial purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 3564) granting an increase of pension to Philip Bixby; and

A bill (S. 3565) granting an increase of pension to Imogen P. Ingersoll; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 3566) authorizing the President to appoint Second Lieut. Ansel G. Wineman as a provisional second lieutenant in the Regular Army (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3567) granting an increase of pension to John McCracken;

A bill (S. 3568) granting an increase of pension to Wilford Herrick (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3569) granting a pension to Belle H. Purdon; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 3570) granting lands for school purposes in Government town sites on reclamation projects; and

A bill (S. 3571) granting lands for school purposes in lots No. 111 in each of the town sites of Fort Shaw and Simms, Sun River reclamation project, Montana; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3572) authorizing the Coos Bay, Umpqua, and Siuslaw Tribes of Indians in the State of Oregon to submit claims to the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 3573) granting an increase of pension to George R. Frazier;

A bill (S. 3574) granting an increase of pension to John Brannan (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3575) granting an increase of pension to William H. Temple (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TILLMAN:

A bill (S. 3576) to pay a cash reward to civilian employees of the Navy; and

A bill (S. 3577) for the relief of certain pay officers of the United States Navy (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 3578) for the relief of Susan V. Marsh (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 3579) for the relief of the Maryland Trust Co., of Baltimore; and

A bill (S. 3580) for the relief of sundry building and loan associations; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 3581) granting an increase of pension to Henry Newell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 3582) for the relief of National Guard officers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE LAW.

Mr. NELSON. I introduce a bill, and inasmuch as it pertains to the root of the difficulty which we are now discussing, I ask that it be read for the information of the Senate.

The bill (S. 3563) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto a new section to be numbered as section —, as follows:

"SECTION —. That within 10 days after the passage and approval of this act it shall be the duty of every person or company responsible for the unloading of any merchandise or commodity of any kind whatsoever, moving and transported by railroad in interstate commerce, to unload the car or cars containing such merchandise or commodity within such time after their arrival at the point of destination as the Interstate Commerce Commission may prescribe, not, however, to exceed in any case the period of seven days, and in case the merchandise or commodity is not unloaded within the period prescribed the railroad carrier may unload such car or cars and charge the expense of the same to the owner or consignee of the merchandise or commodity so unloaded, and the carrier shall have and be entitled to enforce a lien upon the merchandise or commodity so unloaded for the expense of unloading the same."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to say one or two words in reference to this matter.

The events of the last year disclosed the fact that a large number of the coal cars of the country have been kept and maintained at sidings for an indefinite time instead of being unloaded or sent to their destinations. The mere matter of paying a little demurrage did not expedite the unloading of the cars. The consignees were quite content to pay the demurrage for the sake of keeping the coal on the cars in order to get a higher price.

Great Britain heretofore has had the principle of charging demurrage for failure to unload at the proper time, but the war exigencies in that country have compelled the Board of Trade of England, under the so-called defense act, to adopt regulations similar to and in line with those contained in this bill. I regard it as very important that we should have a law on the subject. The mere payment of demurrage to the extent of one dollar or two or three dollars a car will never expedite the unloading of cars as it ought to be expedited.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if there is any parliamentary reason why he should not ask for the immediate consideration of this bill?

Mr. NELSON. It ought to go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I think the committee ought to report the bill back immediately to the Senate. It may not be in proper form; it may require modification; but I am satisfied that this is one of the most effective and important measures that can be passed. It reaches right at the root of the difficulty—this matter of using the cars of the country for storage purposes and keeping the coal on the sidetracks for an indefinite time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to interfere with any course that the Senator has marked out for his bill, but it seems to me that this is so self-evidently a right thing to do that we might do it without referring the bill to any committee at all. Of course the course which the Senator designates is the regular course, and perhaps he has reasons for thinking that he can expedite the legislation by having it take the regular course, but it seems to me that what he proposes does go to the root of the evil. I know that nearly everywhere things are blocked at the termini by the fact that men do prefer to pay demurrage rather than to unload their freight. We ought to go right to the bull's-eye of this trouble, and we ought to do it in the most direct and in the speediest possible manner.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have taken the unusual course of having this bill read and making these brief remarks this morning in order to call the attention of the Committee on Interstate Commerce to this important matter. I think this is a matter that should be acted upon immediately. It reaches to the root of one of the great difficulties under which we are suffering with reference to the coal supply, and I trust that the Committee on Interstate Commerce will take immediate action on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—MARY M. BEEHRLE.

On motion of Mr. CUMMINS, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying Senate bill 1193, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, granting a pension to Mary M. Beehrle, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR BRADY.

Mr. BORAH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 187), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, late a Senator from the State of Idaho, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

NAVAL OIL SUPPLY.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, several days ago I introduced Senate bill 3521 and made a motion to refer it to the Naval Affairs Committee. It has been discussed here for three days. I suppose the discussion has sufficiently enlightened the Senate. I now ask for a vote on it, and demand the yeas and nays on the reference.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I just want to say that if the motion is defeated, as I think it should be, I shall then make a motion to refer the bill to the Senate Committee on Public Lands. That is the only way in which we can get at it. Under the rules of the Senate I am not permitted to offer a substitute motion to refer it to the Senate Committee on Public Lands, or else I would do so. As I said, if the motion is defeated, as I think it ought to be, I shall follow it with a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a word with reference to this motion.

It seems to me that if ever there was a bill before the Senate which should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands rather than the Committee on Naval Affairs it is this bill. If the bill is referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs we will simply ignore all precedent in regard to bills of this kind.

The language of the bill characterizes the bill and shows that it relates to a disposition of the public lands and to large areas of such lands. The first section is to the effect that the absolute title and right of possession to any oil or gas lands within the exterior boundaries of naval petroleum reserve No. 1, and so forth, shall become vested in the United States upon the issuance from time to time by the President of an Executive order or proclamation to that effect; and the bill further provides that the Secretary of the Navy shall have the right to take possession of the lands and all the property on the lands, including property put there by individual owners and claimants, and lease, sell, or operate the same in his discretion directly or by contract, lease, or otherwise.

Mr. President, this bill has no further claim for reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs than a bill disposing of the agricultural lands of the United States or of the forest lands of the United States or of any of the mineral lands of the United States. All, as a matter of course and according to all precedent, have been referred without question to the Committee on Public Lands. Why should this bill, then, be an exception to the rule and be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs?

It was insisted, I understand, by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]—although I did not hear his remarks—that the Committee on Public Lands is not friendly to the bill, and therefore he desires to have it referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That can not be the rule for the reference of bills. I think perhaps it is often a good thing and in the interest of wholesome legislation that the committee to which a bill is referred is not friendly to the bill. That is not to say, however, or to admit for a moment that the Committee on Public Lands will be unfriendly to this bill. The claim that it should be referred to the Naval Affairs Committee is as much as to say, it seems to me, that the Committee on Public Lands is not as sensible of the interests and welfare of the Nation as to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I am satisfied that the Committee on Public Lands will give this bill fair and full consideration, and with the highest regard, too, for the interests of the country.

So, Mr. President, I hope this motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs will not prevail, and that we will follow the precedents established in the past and refer it to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, nothing could be further from my wishes than to trench upon the prerogatives of any committee. It seems to me the distinction is a very plain one. These lands are all segregated. They are separated from public lands and allotted to the Navy for naval uses. The bill itself on its face provides for their management under such regulations as may be made by the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Interior is the head of the department which deals with public land. The matter of fuel for the Navy is of the very last importance. As these lands have been set aside for the use of the Navy, it seems to me the Naval Committee ought to deal with them just as it deals with the lands set aside for the purposes of navy yards, marine barracks, training grounds, or any other naval purpose. The purpose of these lands is a naval purpose, and that is the sole reason why the bill is before us. It is the sole reason why this was separated from the general bill which passed the other day. I think that lands which touch so immediately the vital need of the Navy ought to be left under naval control.

I have no further argument to make, because it seems to me very obvious that a matter which is so distinctly naval ought to be left in the charge of that committee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the statement which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has made, it seems to me, is not borne out by the facts. He has said this land has been set aside for the Navy. The best way to determine that is to read the law, and when the law is to the contrary it seems to me that argument fails.

Now, what is the provision of the law under which this proclamation was made? It was in the act of June 25, 1910, and it provides "that the President may, at any time in his discretion, temporarily withdraw from settlement, location, sale," and so forth. Then in section 2 there is a limitation, and that limitation shows clearly that these lands have not been set aside. Here is the language:

> That all lands withdrawn under the provisions of this act shall at all times be open to exploration, discovery, occupation, and purchase under the mining laws of the United States, so far as the same apply to minerals other than coal, oil, gas, and phosphates.

Is that setting aside these lands exclusively for the purpose of the Navy? Can any such construction be made as that? Does not the right to explore those lands for mining purposes, for metalliferous mines, treat these lands as public domain in those respects, and hence confirms in the Committee on Public Lands its jurisdiction over them? It seems to me that that law ought to settle this question, and that the proper reference of the bill is to the Committee on Public Lands, because you are dealing with the title, and you propose to take this public land away from the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Lands when unquestionably, according to the very authority that you invoke, that committee has the jurisdiction as to these lands and as to everything therein except coal, oil, gas, and phosphates.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. May I ask the Senator from Colorado what is the law that he is reading from?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is called the Pickett Act, which was approved June 25, 1910, and under this act the proclamation of the President was made setting aside these oil reserves.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will permit me, I will show how easy it is for a man to be misled. The fact is that the order of the President setting aside this land was made on the 27th day of September, 1909, nearly a year before that act was passed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; not these lands.

Mr. SWANSON. These lands, if the Senator will permit me, were set aside in 1912.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. This language was used, "For the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy," and the President was authorized by that act to set them aside.

Mr. SHAFROTH. He had no right to do it, except, perhaps, as to the oils in these lands, and they are mixed up with the mineral lands of all kinds therein. Consequently, you do not get exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the act of 1910 authorized what was done regarding this very reserve. This reserve was set aside in 1912 by Executive order. The land was taken for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy. That language was used. The word "temporary" was put in so that the President in case he saw proper might want to make it smaller or larger, but that has not been changed to-day. Under that authority this land is for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy. That is what it says.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the authority which the President has must be relegated to the act itself, and he has not the power to set aside anything except the oil contained therein. Yet this bill provides that the absolute title to all these lands, including everything therein, shall be vested in the Navy.

Mr. President, under those circumstances the idea of taking land that the order does not authorize under the act of Congress, which gave the power to issue an order, and to say that you shall convert a title of the United States of a limited nature into a title of an absolute nature without referring it to the committee that has jurisdiction of all these lands is absurd.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, this is a question merely of the jurisdiction of a committee. The Committee on Public Lands has always exercised jurisdiction over the disposition of public lands, whatever the purpose may be to which the land may be assigned, and when it comes to the legislative action of the Senate the jurisdiction dealing with the question of public lands, even if the lands had been set apart for the use of the Navy or for any other purpose, would not be taken from the hands of the Committee on Public Lands. It seems to me to be an indignity to that committee to take it out of their hands.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Oklahoma, I wish to make this statement. The bill proposes to take lands for naval uses which have already been set aside. The Secretary of the Navy is directed, not the Secretary of the Interior. Who knows how to store oil and conserve oil and confiscate—I mean, condemn—lands for oil? What does this bill do? Here is land that has been set aside for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy, and the bill provides how the Secretary of the Navy shall use it, how he shall operate it, how he shall store oil.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SWANSON. Not now. It provides how the Secretary of the Navy shall store oil and what he shall do with it. It does not direct the Secretary of the Interior to do anything.

It has been impossible to get Senators here to understand one thing, and that is the difference between public land and governmental land. I understand public lands are lands which are open to the public for entry under the rules and regulations. Governmental lands are lands that are owned by the Government, some belonging to the Army, some belonging to the Navy, some belonging to the various departments. These lands are as much set aside for the Navy, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] well said, as land that has been set aside for training camps.

Now, take another view of it. This land is to be condemned. A large portion of this land is private land—no longer public land, but private land. The bill proposes to take the private land under process of condemnation and that the Navy shall use it. I do not see what the Navy has jurisdiction of if it has not jurisdiction of the way it shall obtain, develop, and use oil.

Mr. President, if I mistake not, the gentlemen interested in this bill had the matter referred to the Naval Committee to determine about this naval reserve, and for two weeks we investigated the proposition, heard the Government and heard the private claimants. I can not see any law anywhere under which lands to which patents have been issued and rights established should go to the Committee on Public Lands to determine whether the Navy wants to use them and condemn them for public purposes or not.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator now yield to me?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I congratulate the Senator on disclosing the true intent of the Committee on Naval Affairs when he used the word "confiscate."

Mr. SWANSON. As the Senator alludes to the committee, I had no intention to go into the merits of the bill; but since we must determine the merits of it, I will say that reports have been made from the Committee on Public Lands repeatedly regarding the disposition of these lands that belong to the Government, and they have been such that neither the Attorney General nor the Secretary of the Navy would approve because they thought it was an effort to deprive the Government of the honest right it had in the land for the benefit of private individuals. When this question of the naval reserves came up on the leasing bill the patrons of the bill asked that the naval reserves should be eliminated from the bill, and it was done. I want to say that, so far as the merits of this bill are concerned, there has never been an intention on the part of the Government to deprive an individual of a single right he possesses. An effort has been made here to change the conditions and modify the law in most cases for the benefit of a few rich men and a few rich companies. All we ask is that this land that has been set aside for the Navy shall be held as a naval reserve, and if there is any private claimant to this land, and he can not accept the compromise offered by the Government, let him go into the courts and litigate his claim as to his rights and as to the amount. That is all that this bill provides.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has seen fit to discuss the merits of the proposition under a motion to refer. I do not desire to follow him in that, but I deprecate his last remarks, that those who seek benefits under the legislation proposed are rich men. I submit to the Senate that it is immaterial whether they are rich or poor, if their case is based upon justice and equity. As a matter of fact, the claimants have been impoverished by their confidence in the Government, spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in developing property, because the President, by his order of 1909, withdrew the land from entry and occupation; and on top of that, adding injury to insult, a naval reserve is clapped on. Hence, they have been before the courts for years trying to extricate themselves from these various meshes. The courts have for the greater part sided with their contention, and now it is proposed to pass a new law by which their rights may possibly be recognized under condemnation proceedings and their property taken away and they be compensated.

When this matter came up, as one particularly interested on account of my advocacy of section 16 of the leasing bill, which was afterwards temporarily withdrawn, it appeared to me that it was immaterial whether the men were granted their rights or whether they were compensated for their claims; and I do not know but that the men having claims are quite willing, provided the legislation is speedily enacted, to submit to an arbitration as proposed, or, that failing, to proceedings by condemnation; not, as the Senator inadvertently said, by confiscation.

The Navy has shown much zeal in seeking to acquire these lands, with little consideration for the rights of citizens. There is no man on either committee who I believe would stand in the way for a minute of giving the Navy full use of the oils on these reserves, always contingent upon the fundamental thing that the men who have equitable claims be compensated and that their property be not confiscated.

Now, why should not the bill go to the Committee on Public Lands? It is "public lands." The title is not in the Navy; the title is in the United States, where not privately owned. I think out of 30,000 acres in naval reserve No. 2, in California, the Government has an undisputed title to about 7,000 acres; but what the Navy is seeking is not so much what the Government has but what has been by process of law, under the mining laws—the placer-mining law—acquired by others.

The reason why I contend that the bill should go to the Public Lands Committee is, in the first place, that the lands involved are actually or potentially United States public lands, and it would be contrary to all precedents to refer to any other committee than the Committee on Public Lands. Secondly, the whole matter has been discussed for three years in the Public Lands Committee, and there is no member of the Naval Committee, except two—because they happened to be members also of the Public Lands Committee—who has any familiarity with the subject. It will involve new hearings, meaning indefinite delay. The Public Lands Committee is informed; the Committee on Naval Affairs is not informed. I speak impartially, as a member of both committees.

Now, as to what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has said—that this is a naval reserve, and therefore the bill should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs—it is wholly illogical. The Committee on the Library of this body has jurisdiction over public monuments. It is proposed to erect a monument to an admiral in the Navy or some lesser dignitary, and on behalf of the Senate the Library Committee determines—not the Naval Affairs Committee—the merits of the proposal, in the first instance—the artistic value of the monument—and, second, the propriety of erecting a monument at all. It might with just as much reason be urged that when it is proposed to erect a monument to a man of the Navy, and the proposition is made in the Senate, it should be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I think it is the unbroken precedent that such reference is made to the Library Committee.

At this time it looks to me like it would be a reflection on the Public Lands Committee to make any other reference, because it is a marked departure from precedents.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator who has just taken his seat a question merely for my own information in order to enable me to vote aright. The Senator made the statement that these are still public lands. Of course, if that statement is correct, the lands are still under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, and I presume that the bill has been referred to the Department of the Interior. Is that true?

Mr. PHELAN. That is true; yes.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator, and I am not now going to discuss——

Mr. PHELAN. Excuse me, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. What bill does the Senator refer to as having been referred to the Department of the Interior—the leasing bill?

Mr. GRONNA. This very bill which we are now discussing.

Mr. PHELAN. This bill has not been before any committee, and therefore it has not been referred to any department.

Mr. GRONNA. But if it is a fact, Mr. President, that these lands have merely been withdrawn for naval purposes, they are simply in the same class with other lands which have been withdrawn for Indian reserves or for forest reserves; they are still under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. PHELAN. That is true.

Mr. GRONNA. As to the provisions of this bill, I may be in accord with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], but I do not think the bill should go to a committee which does not possess jurisdiction of it. I believe that the Public Lands Committee has jurisdiction over this bill. I am not going to discuss the merits of the bill at all. I think when it comes to a vote upon the merits of the bill I shall be inclined to vote with the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator what jurisdiction the Public Lands Committee has over half of this land to which private patents have already been issued?

Mr. GRONNA. It would not have jurisdiction over private lands except in certain cases. But the Interior Department would have jurisdiction over patented lands in the case of fraud.

Mr. SWANSON. Who has jurisdiction to convey private lands for the use of the Navy?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Senators must address the Chair to get permission to interrupt a Senator who is speaking.

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Who has jurisdiction of the condemnation of lands for the use of the Navy?

Mr. GRONNA. I presume the courts would be the only bodies having such jurisdiction.

Mr. SWANSON. I mean what committee has charge of bills which are to be considered for that purpose?

Mr. GRONNA. I am inclined to believe that all lands which have not been ultimately disposed of and patented come under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. SWANSON. But over half of this is private land, or about one-half, I do not know the exact amount, for which patents have been issued. This is a private condemnation proceeding to obtain those lands.

Mr. GRONNA. I am not a lawyer, but I should judge that the courts would have jurisdiction of the matter.

Mr. SWANSON. But I am talking of the committee which should have charge of the bill to determine as to the condemnation of private land for naval uses.

Mr. GRONNA. I can only answer the Senator by saying that it is my understanding that part of these lands are still public lands.

Mr. SWANSON. And a part of them is private land, for which patents have been issued. The Senator from North Dakota admits that the Public Lands Committee has no jurisdiction of the matter. The Naval Committee has jurisdiction of all bills to condemn land for naval uses. The only question that comes up is as to that portion of the reserves for which patents have not been issued. What jurisdiction has the Public Lands Committee ever had for land that is private land, and for which patents have been issued? It is proposed to condemn that land for naval purposes.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GRONNA. In a moment. May I answer the question propounded to me, and then I will be glad to yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly. In answering the Senator from Virginia the Senator from North Dakota may answer the question I intended to ask.

Mr. GRONNA. As I understand the provisions of the bill, it does not provide for a condemnation at all.

Mr. SWANSON. It does that absolutely; that is just what it does.

Mr. GRONNA. Then, of course, I misunderstand the meaning of the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I think so.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I should like to answer the question of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GRONNA. I yield first to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should merely like to ask the Senator from Virginia if the fact that some of the lands are patented lands deprives the Public Lands Committee of jurisdiction and confers jurisdiction upon the Naval Committee?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; because none of the lands are public lands, as none of them are open to public entry.

Mr. STERLING. They have been temporarily withdrawn?

Mr. SWANSON. They have been withdrawn for the exclusive use and benefit of the Navy. I do not know the reason for the effort that is being made, but I have never seen in the Senate an effort to deprive a committee that has jurisdiction of all kinds of matters appertaining to the Navy of the control of an important measure of this kind which has to do with securing oil for the Navy. I do not think that such a measure should be controlled, disposed of, and decided by a committee that has never had anything to do with naval matters.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, in answer to the question of the Senator from Virginia, I should like to state——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is really at a loss to know who is entitled to the floor. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] had the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. I think I still have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from South Dakota is through, I will yield to the Senator from California; otherwise I will yield again to the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota yields to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I simply want to make the statement, in connection with a question I asked the Senator from Virginia, that the temporary withdrawal of public lands, whether they are agricultural lands, whether they are forest lands, or whether they are mining lands, does not deprive the Department of the Interior of jurisdiction. Any proposed legislation affecting the sale or disposition of those lands, whatever the character of the lands may be, goes to the Committee on Public Lands. That has been the course always. This bill does affect the title and disposition of the lands, and obviously should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GRONNA. I now yield to the Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota yields to the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, there are three naval reserves, No. 1 and No. 2 being in California, and No. 3 in Wyoming. In naval reserve No. 2 in California there is some patented land. However, the Government is contesting the patents, and hence it can not be said that so long as there is a contest that those lands are patented lands; they may revert to the United States. In naval reserve No. 1 in California I do not believe there is any patented land, and there is certainly no patented land in naval reserve No. 3 in Wyoming. So when the Senator from Virginia makes the point that because some of these lands are patented lands the Committee on Public Lands would lose jurisdiction he seems to be laboring under a mistaken impression.

Now, in naval reserve No. 2 in California, which is the bone of contention, it has been asked whether the Department of the Interior has jurisdiction. The Navy Department and the Department of Justice have been trying—and that is the history of this case—to take away jurisdiction from the Interior Department because the Commissioner of the General Land Office had passed to patent some of these lands, and violence has been done in this, that under executive pressure, the Department of the Interior has temporarily laid aside its action in order that the courts may determine some of the questions involved; and testimony is now being taken before commissioners of the land office in California. So these lands are still, as they properly should be, under the control of the Department of the Interior, but the two other departments are endeavoring to weaken the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, who has, under pressure of this kind, yielded; but he still retains jurisdiction. So he is preserving the integrity of his department under the laws of this country, and the Senate should preserve the integrity of its rules.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to state to the Senator from North Dakota that I think the Senator from Virginia is mistaken when he calls this a condemnation bill. It is a bill which proposes in express terms to transfer title from individuals to the Government of the United States, and then provides a fund out of which the owners, if they can agree with the Government, shall receive compensation. If they can not agree, they are relegated to the tender mercies of the courts.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is quite right in that statement. I have the bill before me, and I find in section 4 the following:

SEC. 4. That the President is hereby authorized, in such manner as he may direct, to agree with any claimant or owner of any property taken under this act upon a division of lands or the proceeds of operation, upon any exchange of lands without the naval petroleum reserves for lands within the reserves.

Now, Mr. President, clearly that is what we call a lieu-land provision that necessarily would come under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior in making exchange, and clearly the Committee on Public Lands has jurisdiction, and not the Committee on Naval Affairs.

I am in sympathy with some of the provisions of the bill, but I do not think it is necessary to refer it to any particular committee to get justice in the Senate. I am quite sure that the Committee on Public Lands is just as willing and just as able to act upon this bill as any other committee, and for that reason, Mr. President, I shall have to vote to refer the measure to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARDWICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], which I transfer to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when the name of Mr. SIMMONS was called). My colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of a death in his family.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], which I transfer to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a regular pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE.] Notwithstanding his absence, being informed that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote, I shall vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. In view of the announcement which has been made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is still detained from the Senate by illness. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] is detained on important public business.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK].

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Bankhead	Hitchcock	New	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Kenyon	Overman	Smith, S. C.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MEMORIAL TO FRANCIS ASBURY.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have here a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 107) which was reported favorably this morning from the Committee on the Library by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of a joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant permission to the Francis Asbury Memorial Association for the erection on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, D. C., other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, and the White House, of a memorial to Francis Asbury, a pioneer itinerant, whose continuous journeyings through our cities, towns, villages, and early settlements, from 1771 to 1816, greatly promoted the interests of patriotism, education, morality, and religion and were a distinct aid to the American Republic: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of the said memorial.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMED FORCES OF THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7697) to authorize the calling into the service of the United States the militia and other locally created armed forces in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the militia and other locally created armed forces in the Philippine Islands may be called into the service of the United States, and all members thereof may be drafted into said service and organized in such manner as is or may be provided by law for calling or drafting the National Guard into said service, and shall in all respects while therein be upon the same footing with members of the National Guard so called or drafted: Provided, That the pay and allowances of officers and men of the Philippine Militia and other locally created armed forces in the Philippine Islands called into the service of the United States under the provisions of this act when serving in the Philippine Islands shall in no case exceed the pay and allowances for corresponding grades of Philippine Scouts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ZONES AROUND SHIPYARDS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 3387, Order of Business 170. There are three bills on the calendar, reported favorably by the Commerce Committee. In view of the general situation, they are regarded as being very important, and I hope the Senate will dispose of them. Order of Business No. 170 is the first one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3387) to authorize and empower the President to create military zones around shipyards where vessels are under construction for the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 10, page 2, after the word "requisition," to insert "condemnation," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States of America, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered from time to time to create and establish, within defined areas surrounding any shipbuilding plant where vessels are under construction for the United States of America a military or war zone; that such designated area shall be directly under the control of the President, with the right and authority to treat such area as if it were a fort, camp, or other military establishment of the United States of America, and that all laws applicable to forts, camps, or other military establishments shall be applicable to the zone or area so designated; and any person, persons, firm, or corporations who shall violate any such law shall be punishable in the manner therein provided. Should it become necessary or desirable to take over or occupy or use any buildings, land, or other property within such area, the United States may acquire such property or the use thereof by purchase, requisition, condemnation, or otherwise, and shall make just compensation therefor, to be determined by the President; and if the amount thereof so determined by the President is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States of America to recover such further sums as added to 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

The President may exercise the power and authority hereby vested in him through the several departments of the Government and through such agency or agencies as he shall determine from time to time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF SHIPYARD EMPLOYEES.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the next Order of Business, being Senate bill 3388.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 171. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3388) to amend the emergency shipping fund provisions of the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved June 30, 1917, so as to empower the President and his designated agents to take over certain transportation systems for the transportation of shipyard and plant employees, and for other purposes.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, does the consideration of this measure require unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent has already been given.

Mr. CALDER. I did not hear the Presiding Officer put the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked if there was objection, and the Chair said he heard none, and the Secretary then read the title of the bill.

Mr. CALDER. I did not hear the Chair. If I had heard him, I would have objected to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; I desire the bill to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold, then, that there is objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator imagine that the discussion of the bill would take very much time?

Mr. CALDER. I think it would. I am opposed to the measure.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to dispose of the bill. If the objection is sustained, however, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the next bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

HOUSING OF SHIPYARD EMPLOYEES.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 3389, the next bill on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 3389, to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the request of the Senator from Florida. It does seem to me, though, that this bill is a very important one, and that it ought to receive some attention at the hands of Senators. Of course, those of us who are not upon the committee have not had the advantage of hearing the testimony that may have been given, and can not act as intelligently in respect to this matter as the Members of the Senate who are members of the committee to which I have just referred. If it would not inconvenience the Senator, and if the urgency is not too great, it would suit me very much if the Senator would allow the bill to go over for one day.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say, Mr. President, that both these bills are regarded as very important by the Commerce Committee and by the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation. With reference to this bill, I submit to the Senator a letter I received just this morning, addressed to me, and reading as follows:

Bill S. 3389, which you so kindly introduced to the Senate is so necessary to the housing operations of the Shipping Board that I know you will pardon my request that you hasten its passage as quickly as possible.

Several conditions have arisen in securing property for housing that will delay matters considerably unless we have the power to take the land at once and arrange for details later. These questions refer not only to price but also to cases where the property is tied up in estates, the controlling party of which may be abroad or can not be found quickly. Your bill will give us the power to take the land and make all adjustments later, and it will be an extremely helpful aid if this bill could be disposed of this week.

I hope you will pardon my constant recurrence to this matter, as I appreciate that you are doing everything possible to aid us in our shipbuilding program.

Very truly, yours, EDWARD N. HURLEY,
Chairman.

That indicates the importance of the measure, and I should like very much to dispose of it now. The committee thoroughly considered it. There are a few amendments that the committee made to the bill as it was originally introduced. The situation really is a very critical one with reference to housing the employees who are engaged in work upon the various shipbuilding enterprises in certain portions of the country. This bill is to apply only where provision of this kind must be made in order that the work may proceed. There are a few instances of that kind, where, for instance, two or three thousand men could be added to the force to speed up the completion of these ships, if there were places where the employees could live; and the bill is intended to meet situations of that sort.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Florida permit me to suggest that the Senator from Florida, if he can do so without burdening himself unnecessarily, simply state what is the purpose of this bill, what particular thing it is to do, so that the Senator from Utah may understand that this is not the bill that I am sure the Senator from Utah is of the opinion that it is, and that it does not contain certain subject matters of which he has been reading? I should like to have the Senator know that this bill happens not to contain in its provisions the matter which I am sure is the thing in his mind, and in which he is probably interested.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not think I have any misapprehension as to the character of this bill. As I understand it, it is to authorize the expenditure of $50,000,000, or any sum less than that, for the acquisition of land by condemnation proceedings or otherwise upon which to erect houses, and to provide the necessary fixtures for those houses, incident to supplying homes for those who may be engaged in working upon the ships that may be constructed by the Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that the plan contemplates the Government's getting back the entire expenditure. It is not to be paid out never to be reimbursed. The advance will be made in the first instance by the Government, and then the Government will eventually, by an amortization plan, receive back its entire outlay. The purpose of this bill is mainly to give the right of condemnation.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Florida in which cities or ports it is expected that this amount of money will be utilized?

Mr. FLETCHER. There are three Government plants being established—one at Hog Island, not a great way from Philadelphia; another at Bristol, Pa.; and the other at Newark, N. J. Houses will be needed for the employees in these three plants that are being built and owned by the Government. Then there is also a situation at Newport News, Va., and one in Newark, N. J., where the New York Shipbuilding Co. is concerned.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the chairman of the committee that another place of this kind where housing accommodations are urgently needed is at Sparrows Point, Md. That is a point that is so far out from the city of Baltimore that it is hard to get men there without furnishing them houses. I want to say, if the Senator will allow me, that the Committee on Commerce were unanimously in favor of this legislation after a full hearing on the subject.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the present consideration of the bill, but I want to say at the outset that as a general rule I regard with a good deal of apprehension the appropriation of money to be utilized by the Government in acquiring land and building homes. It is a matter of common knowledge that expenditures made by the Government do not bring the results that expenditures made by individuals do. Whatever the Government does it does at a tremendous and staggering price. I have felt that the patriotism of the people wherever these shipyards are to be found, and the business enterprise of the individuals there, would provide ample homes for the workingmen that will be required for the building of the ships.

Of course, as I said a moment ago, I have not the advantage of the information that the Committee on Commerce had, because men have appeared before them who have given the apparent reasons for this legislation; but I do say that it seems to me that there is no necessity for the Government embarking upon this stupendous enterprise. If we appropriate $50,000,000 now, unquestionably there will be a deficiency appropriation, and further appropriations will be required, and we will be embarking upon a wild scheme of house building and home building and land reclamation and land purchase the end of which no man can foresee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read first for action on the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendments, the amendments of the committee to be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I simply want to say with reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that I sympathize very much with the position he takes. I know that the committee took into account the various matters to which he referred, but the testimony was so strong before the committee showing the imperative need of this legislation and the need of the Government taking action that we felt constrained to lay aside our scruples along the line the Senator from Utah has indicated, feeling that the bill is absolutely necessary to procure the ships necessary to carry on the war.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the testimony submitted to the committee indicate the extreme limit that would be required for the purposes indicated in the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That could not be done. The conditions are local in connection with many of the shipbuilding plants throughout the country and the conditions that the committee know to exist at the particular yards referred to by the chairman of the committee could be duplicated. The representatives of the Emergency Fleet Corporation did believe that we could do all that was necessary within the limits that we have proposed in the bill, but of course nobody knows what conditions may develop in different parts of the country. However, the conditions at the yards mentioned by the chairman of the committee and by the Senator from Minnesota imperatively press this legislation upon us now.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I have understood that there was a plan to erect buildings in Seattle and to erect buildings in San Francisco and in Philadelphia, and in some town in Massachusetts where shipyards are found. It seemed to me that if there was any purpose to erect buildings there it must be improper, that the needs of any number of employees who might be brought there for Government purposes would be amply supplied in the towns and cities to which I have just referred.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No plan of that kind has been suggested, but I will say to the Senator that it was brought out that some complaints had been made from Seattle with reference to conditions there. However, those complaints are being very carefully investigated, and unless a situation does develop that makes it imperatively necessary to promote the shipbuilding program that the Government shall take a hand in providing housing facilities, it will not be undertaken either at Seattle or at any other place.

Now, there is this pressing necessity. The pressing necessity does not appear at any of those places now, but it does appear at these other places. It may develop at some of the other places, as the Senator must understand. Take, for instance, Seattle, where the shipbuilding industry is developing possibly more rapidly than at any other single point in the country, and the number of shipbuilding employees has increased from a couple of thousand to over 20,000. With the new ships that are being contemplated and that are being constructed there and the new yards that are being built, it may be necessary to secure, if possible, twenty or thirty thousand more shipbuilding employees. If the housing facilities are not sufficient to provide for the men engaged in the building of those ships without the aid of the Government, according to the testimony before the committee, it will be imperatively necessary that we should provide those facilities.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I make a suggestion to the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest to the Senator, in reply to the thought in the mind of the Senator from Utah about local cooperation, and that situation is being taken care of by local interests, it is the purpose of the Emergency Fleet Corporation to have local interests take care of the situation if it is possible to do so. That is a part of the plan. Their resources will be exhausted before the Emergency Fleet Corporation will undertake to have the Government intervene, and if they can not do otherwise, then they will simply get the cooperation of local interests. But I believe the Senator will agree that the Emergency Fleet Corporation will have this entire fund reimbursed to the Government.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They expect eventually to recover it, and the committee does not contemplate that the Emergency Fleet Corporation will put the Government into the housing business anywhere that it is not imperative for it to go; but of course we can not just prescribe the limit; we must leave a discretion.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator what is the amount carried for this special work? I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, but was not present at the time this bill was considered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We authorize housing facilities not to exceed $50,000,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Where is it to be used?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is left to the discretion of the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Of course, we have to leave it to their discretion, because we do not know all the points where a necessity may arise.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was going to ask the chairman in charge of the bill whether the bill would permit the Emergency Fleet Corporation to erect any other buildings than dwelling houses.

Mr. FLETCHER. It authorizes it—to construct on such land houses and all other necessary or convenient facilities, upon such conditions and at such price as may be determined, and to sell, lease, or exchange such houses, land, and facilities upon such terms and conditions as it may determine.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the term "facilities," is it the opinion of the Senator that buildings for stores and shops will be included?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think not, but, for instance, there was a suggestion that there were possibly hotels already on the premises, and possibly summer-resort houses in the vicinity, that could be acquired under the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The object of my inquiry is to make sure that the hands of the Emergency Fleet Corporation are not tied in that respect.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator is right about that, and that they will have a leeway in that regard.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are several kinds of buildings other than dwelling houses which will, in my judgment, become necessary to be erected, buildings to contain stores and shops or halls for meeting purposes, buildings and facilities to meet all the amenities of life. I am under the impression that this matter of housing will, before this war is many months older, become one of the most important problems confronting the Government, and I want to be absolutely certain that when we approach it we approach it in a broad spirit, so that the Government's hands shall not be tied down to the mere building of dwelling houses.

The experience of England has been that, under their ministry of munitions, whole towns have had to be built, towns containing 20,000 to 30,000 people. It involves a great deal more than the mere building of dwelling houses. It involves the building of many other kinds of buildings in order that the workmen and their families shall lead a contented, comfortable, and happy existence socially. I think we can not direct our view too far in this matter. That is the purpose of my question addressed to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. NELSON rose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. If the chairman of the committee will permit me, I have not any doubt that all these things can be done under the bill. I think the only limitation is that it can not be used to build shops for the yard proper; that will come under other measures; but everything that pertains to the housing of the working force and to their comfort can be done under the provisions of the bill. I have not any doubt about that. The bill is purposely framed in general terms so that they can lease or acquire by condemnation already existing buildings, remodel them, and put them in shape, and do whatever is necessary to properly house the employees.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that was the purpose, to supply all the living conditions of a community.

Mr. WADSWORTH. While I am on my feet, I desire to have the attention of the Senate for just a moment on this question in its broad aspect. I am absolutely in favor of what this bill seeks to do, but I call the attention of the Senator from Florida and the Senators here present that once again we are making the error of going at this question piecemeal. This legislation places upon the Emergency Fleet Corporation the building of facilities for the housing of workmen. That is one agency of the Government which is to be clothed with that power. In my humble judgment it will not be the only agency of the Government that will have to have the same power. Before we get through we will have to view this housing problem as it applies to the men and women who work in munition factories. Before we get through I believe we will have to supply housing facilities for a largely increased number of workmen in the neighborhood of the great steel mills engaged in the manufacture of ordnance, cannon, ammunition, rifles, and various kinds of supplies for the Army or the Navy. This bill, of course, applies only to the shipbuilding program.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. I think the Committee on Commerce is impressed with the necessity of which the Senator from New York speaks, but we have felt that this bill would meet the present emergency best because shipping is so vital to all our operations; and, indeed, they already have housing contracts in process of execution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am in entire sympathy with the passage of this bill, but I do not want this opportunity to go by without pointing out the essential weakness of our war-making machinery, and this is a perfect example of it; it must be cured sooner or later by the centralizing of these activities under one control as it has been done in England and as it has been done in France. As an example, the Government is about to build an enormous powder manufactory in the State of West Virginia under the auspices, I understand, of the War Department, and another one in the State of Tennessee. They are to be brand-new plants, with a capacity of hundreds of thousands of pounds of powder per day. Without question, the housing problem will have to be met in that connection. Now, are we going to leave that housing problem to the War Department and another housing problem to the Shipbuilding Board?

I call the attention of the Senate to this situation because I believe we have only commenced the solution of this problem, and that sooner or later we must centralize it under one head.

In this connection I want to remind the Senate that to-day the Committee on Military Affairs reported to the Senate a bill creating the office of director of munitions, under whose jurisdiction and control the President may, in his discretion, place all problems of this sort, involving not only the production, procurement, and manufacture of materials used in the war, but also the housing problem, under the language of the bill, and I did not want Senators to let this bill go through without remembering that this does not cure the problem. It is only the first step, and sooner or later we shall have to take away, by direction of the President, the housing problem from the Emergency Fleet Corporation and place it under a central control, because a housing problem in one line of industry is not essentially different from the housing problem in another line of industry.

I want to say further, my support of this bill is conditioned, in a sense, upon the hope that the Senate and the Congress in the very near future will follow the example of Great Britain and France and place these things under a central control. Otherwise we shall continue to have, as we have had in the past, competing agencies of the Government. There are to-day four governmental purchasing bureaus purchasing rubber boots, there are five bureaus of the War Department purchasing trucks, and here we will have, if we do not cure this situation, two or three or four different governmental departments or bureaus engaged at one and the same time in the housing problem.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I agree fully with what the Senator from New York has said. I myself have been looking to the Military Committee, of which he is a member, for a bill providing for organization along the line to which he refers, and I was glad to note the report from that committee to-day of the bill which I trust will do just exactly what is outlined here. But our committee, of course, was faced with this emergency proposition. We are not a military committee, but this seemed to come within our jurisdiction, and we acted as promptly as possible upon the showing made. I should like to see, however, and I think it is necessary, all brought under one head, so that the various activities connected with the war can be directed definitely and clearly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Committee on Commerce have done, of course, the very best thing possible, but I did not want this moment to go by without calling attention to it, because our weakness so far in this war is that we have not planned out in advance on a broad scale the effort which America must make. We have scattered our authority and our power to half a dozen governmental agencies, and it is that very failure of ours to concentrate the authority and to plan out things two months, three months, six months in advance that has created the coal situation in the United States to-day.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in my support of this bill I recognize the justice of the criticisms that have been offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I wish, however, that the bill went a little further than it does and made provision not only for the housing of the people in the shipyards of the country but some provision whereby people could be protected in the acquirement for consumption of the necessities of life. The housing problem is becoming more and more acute, and so is that of ordinary living. The experience of everybody who is unfortunate enough to live in the District of Columbia now is too constant and acute to require any extended statement to convince him at least of the fact that the war conditions have been taken advantage of by the purveyors to rob not only the residents of the District but everybody who is here either indefinitely or temporarily, and I have no doubt the same conditions apply to other sections of the country, although perhaps not to such an extent. The degree to which rent has risen and to which the cost of provisions has risen in this District is almost unbelievable. Some of the ships which are being constructed are in yards either within or very close to the boundaries of the District of Columbia. Certainly there the employees are subjected to the same disabilities, the same coercion, and the same oppression which we are all enduring up to this time without much attempt upon the part of the General Legislature to interfere.

I shall in the near future make the effort to secure some legislation by Congress regarding housing and the living conditions in the District of Columbia, with a view, if possible, of imposing some limitation upon the greed, the unscrupulousness, the avarice, and the extortion which seem to be a common practice in this city.

It would seem as though the landlords, the grocers, the merchants generally, with here and there a few honorable exceptions, have entered into a conspiracy to see to it that no man who gets any money from the Treasury of the United States shall cross the Potomac before they can put it in their pockets. People have to come to this city, which is the Capital of the Nation, when the Nation is at war. They have no discretion about it. Certainly in the majority of the instances their interests require their presence in the city, sometimes indefinitely and sometimes for a few days, and they are the common prey of a condition that is disgraceful to the Capital and which should not be tolerated overnight.

I think the sooner this Congress, which has absolute jurisdiction over the District, should recognize that to be one of the emergency conditions requiring legislative consideration the better.

Now, I do not know to what extent it will go. I know one man who was fortunate enough to buy a return ticket when he came here and I think he got out of the city, although whether he had enough left with which to pay for meals en route to his home I have not yet ascertained.

I do not think, Mr. President, we can speak too extremely upon this subject. It is one which would justify, if anything would justify it, a resort to brute force, if there could be no other method of relief from these exactions. I greatly fear it may come to that, Mr. President, if we do not in some way put a check on the conditions which here prevail.

I say this bill is a movement in the right direction. It is both a local and a national problem, and I hope the Committee on Commerce will consider the exigent conditions which may require, and which I think do require, some legislation regarding the cost of the necessities of life to the consumer.

The Food Commission some time ago placed a maximum of prices upon the necessities of life to the producer, and the retailer seems to have taken advantage of it by enhancing his own prices. The consumers up to this time have obtained no benefit whatever from food regulation, yet they have complied and will continue to patriotically comply with every regulation which may be made by the commission.

The general situation is well illustrated by an article in the last Saturday Evening's Post which pictures a landlord and his chef in consultation. The landlord says, "You halve the portions; I will double the price. We must both clamor for another meatless day. We have to do something to win this war." That is the character of patriotism at this juncture in the Nation's affairs which characterizes, I think I may safely say, the majority of retailers of the necessities of life.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce will be stated.

The amendments were, in section 1, on page 1, line 6, after the word "or," to strike out "otherwise"; in line 7, after the word "acquire," to insert "by condemnation or otherwise"; on page 2, line 4, before the word "such," to strike out "otherwise dispose of" and insert "exchange"; in line 6, after the word "or," to strike out the word "otherwise"; in line 7, before the word "any," to insert "by condemnation or otherwise"; in line 9, after the word "proper," to insert "fixtures and"; in line 10, after the word "or," to strike out "otherwise dispose of" and insert "exchange"; in line 11, after the word "such," to insert "lands"; in the same line, after the word "houses," to strike out "and," and after the word "buildings," in the same line, to insert "fixtures and furnishings," and to strike out lines 13 to 19 in the following words:

(d) To cancel, modify, suspend, or requisition any existing or future contract relating to the purchase, lease, or mortgage of any such land or building. All houses, land, facilities, and furnishings acquired as herein provided shall be leased, sold, or otherwise disposed of only to persons now or hereafter employed in the shipyards constructing ships for the United States.

In line 22, before the word "acquire," to strike out "otherwise"; after the word "acquire," in the same line, to insert "by condemnation or otherwise"; in line 23, after the word "houses," to strike out "or shall cancel, modify, suspend, or requisition any such contract"; on page 3, line 10, after the word "requisitioning," to insert "condemning"; in line 12, after the word "cease," to strike out "six months after" and insert "with"; in line 21, after the word "requisitioning," to insert "condemning"; in line 22, after the word "facilities," to strike out "or" and insert "fixtures and"; and on page 4, line 3, after the word "sum," to strike out the words "and there is hereby appropriated for such purpose $25,000,000," so as to make the section read:

That the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation is hereby authorized and empowered within the limits of the amounts herein authorized.

(a) To purchase, lease, requisition, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise any improved or unimproved land suitable for the construction thereon of houses for the use of employees of shipyards in which there are now being constructed ships for the United States.

(b) To construct on such land houses and all other necessary or convenient facilities, upon such conditions and at such price as may be determined, and to sell, lease, or exchange such houses, land, and facilities upon such terms and conditions as it may determine.

(c) to purchase, lease, requisition, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise any houses or other buildings, together with the land on which the same are erected, and all necessary and proper fixtures and furnishings therefor; to manage, repair, sell, lease, or exchange such lands, houses, buildings, fixtures, and furnishings upon such terms and conditions as it may determine.

Whenever said United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall purchase, lease, requisition, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise such land or such houses it shall make just compensation therefor, to be determined by it, and if the amount thereof so determined by it is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by it, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to such 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

The power of purchasing, leasing, requisitioning, condemning, or otherwise acquiring such land and houses herein granted shall cease with the termination of the present war with Germany.

The word "person" used herein shall include any person, trustee, firm, or contractor. The word "shipyard" shall include any factory, workshop, warehouse, engine works, buildings used for manufacturing, assembling, construction, or other process in shipyard and dockyards and discharging terminal, and other facilities connected therewith, now or hereafter in connection with shipbuilding.

The cost of purchasing, leasing, requisitioning, condemning, or otherwise acquiring houses, lands, facilities, fixtures, and furnishings shall not exceed the sum of $50,000,000, the expenditure of which is hereby authorized, and in executing the authority granted by this act for such purpose, the said United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall not expend or obligate the United States to expend more than the said sum.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF FUEL ADMINISTRATOR.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have no desire to prolong this session or to indulge in any post-mortem remarks on the Garfield order. I think, however, Dr. Garfield will have some trouble in convincing the American people that his order was wise and conservative. I ask to have read a telegram from the president of a cotton mill at Water Valley, Miss., and I wish to say that the author of that telegram is one of the most sagacious business men and patriotic citizens in the entire country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WATER VALLEY, MISS., January 18, 1918.

Senator JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Urge Garfield to suspend that order until its necessity is established by investigation. Such drastic measures will cause the southern farmers, merchants, and manufacturers to lose millions of dollars and mills' operatives absolutely suffering.

YOCOMA COTTON MILLS,
Per JOHN V. WAGNER,
Secretary and Treasurer.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 21, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 18, 1918.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, God our Father, source of every blessing, we thank Thee for the gifts Thou has bestowed upon us.

Strengthen our will, quicken our conscience, guide us in the use of our faculties, that we may be worthy recipients and faithful servants to Thee and to our fellow men. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LONDON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. LONDON. To make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Flynn	Lesher	Sabath
Bacharach	Focht	Lever	Sanders, N. Y.
Barnhart	Francis	McAndrews	Sanford
Beakes	Fuller, Mass.	McArthur	Saunders, Va.

The SPEAKER. On this call 300 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—THE HAYDEN BILL.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday before the House adjourned, I asked unanimous consent to vacate the order with reference to House bill 269, known as the Hayden bill. It was suggested that as a very few Members were then present I would renew the request this morning. So I renew the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to vacate an order agreed to December 12, 1917, by which House bill 269 was given precedence over all bills that should be reported after the 12th of December. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I desire to say before I make the request that I intend to object—I would like to have two or three minutes in which to state the reasons on which I propose to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I care nothing about the Hayden bill, and I do not make this objection as an opponent of the $3-a-day bill, known as the Nolan bill, although I shall oppose that bill when it comes up for consideration. But the reason why I propose to object to this unanimous consent is that I think this Congress should enact as little legislation as possible except for the conduct of this war. [Applause.] I do not believe that the people of this country are in a frame of mind to enact general legislation other than that absolutely necessary for the successful conduct of the war. This unanimous consent ties up Calendar Wednesday for the balance of this Congress under the ruling of the Speaker. Whatever legislation is necessary to conduct this war can come from the Committee on Rules and can be brought before the House in that way. That is the reason that prompts me in making this objection. So long as this order exists there will be little opportunity to get legislation on Calendar Wednesday, and I anticipate that other days will be used for war legislation and appropriation bills.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; I reserve the objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. NOLAN. Does the gentleman think that all legislation by unanimous consent should be stopped during the session?

Mr. GARNER. Except legislation that is purely local in its nature.

Mr. NOLAN. I just want to say that if we can not get this thing straightened out so that the Committee on Labor can get a day in court there will be no more unanimous-consent motions agreed to during this Congress, either on legislation or anything else.

Mr. GARNER. Realizing the intense interest of the gentleman in this bill, I suggest there is a way in which it can be done, through the Committee on Rules. If I were a member of the Committee on Rules I would give liberal consideration to the request for a rule on this bill. This bill is not fundamentally the reason for my objection to the vacation of this unanimous-consent order that is now on the calendar. This unanimous-consent order virtually ties up Calendar Wednesday during the remainder of this Congress, and that is what I want to do. I want to prevent, namely, general legislation during the balance of this Congress. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAYDEN. I want to find out whether the Chair agrees with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that this special order does tie up Calendar Wednesday so that no business can be done on that day for the remainder of this session? I do not understand that to be a fact. If the Chair will read the order as adopted, it states that—

On motion of Mr. KITCHIN, by unanimous consent: Ordered, That when bills now on the calendar which are in order on Calendar Wednesday shall have been disposed of, the bill H. R. 269 shall be in order on Calendar Wednesday.

My understanding of the order is that the ordinary procedure on Calendar Wednesday would continue as heretofore, and that bills, such as the minimum-wage measure called up last Wednesday by the Committee on Labor, would be in order. The only change is that when all the bills then on the calendar are considered, then, in the due order of events, my bill will be in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman answered his own parliamentary inquiry by reading that. It means this, that all of the bills that can be called up on Calendar Wednesday that were put on the calendar before December 12 have to be cleaned up before the Hayden bill comes up. After that is disposed of or waived out of the way then any other bill that could come up on Calendar Wednesday is in order when the committee is called.

Mr. HAYDEN. Then the special order of December 12 does not entirely tie up Calendar Wednesday for the remainder of the session?

The SPEAKER. It ties up Calendar Wednesday until all the bills that can be called up on Calendar Wednesday that were put on the calendar previous to the 12th day of December are cleared away.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. May I say that the Committee on Mines and Mining was ready to report a bill on the 7th of January? The question was asked if this bill would come up when our committee was reached, and the statement was made that there was no hurry in reporting the bill for the reason that this order which the Speaker has interpreted was in existence, and the committee acted accordingly and consumed only a part of the day on account of that rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to ask, for information, how many people were present in the House when the unanimous-consent order just referred to by the gentleman from Arizona was made?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. A quorum.

The SPEAKER. To whom was that question addressed?

Mr. MADDEN. I was asking the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair does not know.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There was a quorum here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] objects to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 8696); and, pending that motion, I should like to ask if we can not come to some agreement upon the time for general debate?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We have requests for about three hours over here.

Mr. NORTON. Four hours.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Nearly four hours.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on the pending bill close in five and one-half hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that general debate close in five and one-half hours.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman mean after five and one-half hours have been consumed in debate, or does he mean five and one-half hours from now? It might make a great difference.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. After five and one-half hours have been consumed in general debate, three hours and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and two hours by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman adds to the request that three and one-half hours be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and two hours by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, may we have an understanding that the bill will not be read to-day, except the first paragraph?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That was the intention on this side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8696) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the pending appropriation bill provides for one of the activities of the Interior Department. I notice that recently the head of the Interior Department issued an order, which he has full power to issue, changing the hours of service in the Department of the Interior in Washington. His order is that instead of going to work at 9 o'clock in the morning and quitting at 4.30 in the afternoon, with one-half hour for lunch, making a seven-hour day, the clerks shall go to work at 8.45 and quit at 4.15, with a half hour for lunch, making a seven-hour day. The reason given for that was that it would be a matter of great convenience to the street car companies in Washington and relieve the congestion upon the street car traffic. That is a very laudable object, and consults the convenience of the clerks as well as of other people in Washington.

Of course it has another effect. By letting the clerks out at 4.15 they have that much longer time, if they choose, to spend on the streets and in the department stores and shops, and to patronize the merchants and industries of Washington. It occurs to the ordinary man who is not interested in the real estate ring or the business interests of Washington, to inquire why the Government clerks in Washington should not work a standard day of eight hours? In my judgment, there is no reason why even in time of peace the men who are being paid out of the Federal taxes for performing the people's work in Washington should not give an honest day's work. [Applause.] But it seems to me it is even more important in time of war, when great sacrifices are required of all of the people of the United States, when great burdens and responsibilities are being laid upon all the people of the United States, that the men who are paid out of the Federal Treasury for performing the work of the people in the Nation's Capital should give an honest standard day's work to the taxpayers. I have always believed that there is such a thing as an honest day's work. I believe that there is just as much an honest day's work as there is an honest dollar or an honest pound. I can not agree with those men who say that a day's work is eight hours or less. I would as soon assume that a dollar was 100 cents or less, or that a pound was 16 ounces or less, how much less depending upon the skill of the man who makes the offer and the helplessness or negligence of the man to whom the offer is made.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Are not these employees all under the heads of the various departments and subject to the orders of the heads of their departments?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Then should not the gentleman go to the heads of those departments with this question?

Mr. BORLAND. I am discussing that very point. The Secretary of the Interior could have made his order providing for an eight-hour day. He has that power. But Congress, representing the people, and imposing the burdens of taxation upon the people, also has the power to direct the executive officer. So there is no excuse for Congress in the fact that the heads of departments have the power, which they do not exercise.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BORLAND. If it is a brief one, yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not the duty of the heads of departments to see that the employees furnish a day's work for the compensation they receive?

Mr. BORLAND. I think so.

Mr. DOWELL. Then is not this a department matter?

Mr. BORLAND. Is the gentleman in favor of an honest day's work of eight hours or not?

Mr. DOWELL. Is not this a matter for the heads of the departments?

Mr. BORLAND. Answer that question. Is the gentleman in favor of giving the taxpayers an honest day's work?

Mr. DOWELL. That is up to the heads of the departments.

Mr. BORLAND. Is the gentleman in favor of it? The gentleman does not want to answer.

Mr. DOWELL. I am always in favor of an honest day's labor, but I think the heads of the departments ought to have charge of the direction of employees. It is up to the heads of the departments, and the gentleman's criticism should go to the heads of the departments if there is any criticism.

Mr. BORLAND. According to the gentleman's argument, we should abrogate all functions of the legislative body. We have the same power to direct them in this matter that we have in any other. This is no time for slackers. You can not win the war with slackers; you can not win the war running this great workshop, the Nation's Capital, upon a short-change basis. The people will not submit to have their great workshop, the Nation's Capital, containing now over 50,000 employees, run upon a short-day basis. They have a right to insist upon an honest day's work from the Nation's servants in the Capital. So far as I am concerned, I am free to admit, and I hope I am almost universally right in saying, that the Government clerks themselves would submit cheerfully to an order for an eight-hour day. Many of them resent being put in the position of slackers. I have had expressions to that effect from scores of them in whom I have confidence.

The real objection does not come from the employees. The real objection has always come from the real-estate ring and business interests in Washington. It is plainly to their interest that there should be a large Government pay roll, with an excessive number of employees, working a short number of hours for a high rate of pay. Their interests are directly opposed to the interests of the taxpayers of the country. They are interested in increasing the cost and the burden to the Government and decreasing efficiency.

What is the result? A short-change day does injure the Nation in two ways. First, it adds to the burdens of the Government, which is wrong. We ought not to allow a single unnecessary stroke on the lacerated back of the American taxpayer.

Second, it decreases the efficiency of the Government in a time when the very life of democracy is at stake.

This is not a time to pander to the slackers of the Nation. [Applause.] Criticisms are springing up with mushroom growth all over the United States against the lack of preparedness, the lack of speed, in the departments at Washington. Where is this lack of speed? Why, in some of the bureaus of the War Department and the Navy Department, and in some in the State Department they are working eight hours a day and longer, but here in the Interior Department, in the safe shelter from war, and in the Department of Commerce, and in the Department of Labor and some other departments in Washington, they are still working on a short-change day. Is that efficiency? They are asking now to bring thousands of new clerks to Washington. They are going into the commercial cities and stripping the business interests of employees, offering high wages, and bringing them here.

They have all the clerks here now that they can use [applause] if they use them on a proper working day. They could transfer men from any department where they are overmanned with clerks and put them in other departments. How do I know? I will tell you. Not long ago a young fellow came into my office. He was a reporter on a Washington newspaper and was drumming up propaganda in favor of high wages. I told him I thought they ought to give an honest day's work first as a preliminary to asking an increase of wages. He said, "Personally, I think so, too. I have not been in Washington long enough to get tarred with the Washington stick. I have got a young friend, 16 years old, working in the Congressional Library for $720 a year, and he holds another job for $1,200 in another department." I was amazed, but I looked up the order and found that that was possible. A man can and does hold two jobs in Washington. Then here comes this blanket proposition to increase the compensation by 30 per cent.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman happen to know—this is all news to me—whether this young man is working at night in the Congressional Library?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I assume that he puts in the short hours in the Library and works at night in the War Department.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He has to do it one way or the other.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. One hundred and sixty dollars a month is pretty fair pay for a boy 16 years old, and an increase of 30 per cent would make it $208, which would be pretty fair. I do not think it is warranted.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. For a brief question.

Mr. NORTON. Has the gentleman recently visited any department where the clerks are working and has he noticed that a large part of their time is spent in twirling their thumbs and fingers and waiting for something to do?

Mr. BORLAND. I know from the statement of experts on the subject that 60 per cent of the people now employed in Washington, properly arranged, could do more work than the clerks are now doing. I know they are suffering from the worst kind——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman speaks of an honest day's work being performed by Government employees. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of an honest day's work being performed by railroad employees?

Mr. BORLAND. I am. No doubt about that. My experience, I may also state, is that the farmers do not confine themselves to eight hours a day.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. For a question.

Mr. LITTLE. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that there are a great many first-class stenographers working for first-class stenographers' wages who are employed to fold papers and do work that could be done by a schoolboy?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I came across a case of that kind the other day. I found an expert stenographer brought here from a law office in the West being paid $1,100, and she was sticking cards into an index, which could be done just as well by a $40 a month office boy. I had her transferred. I do not believe in that sort of thing; I do not think we ought to strip the business interests of the country of skilled office employees and bring them down here for any such $40 a month work. If they need $1,100 stenographers they are entitled to have them, but they ought to have people of that kind doing work necessary to be done by an employee worth $1,100 as a stenographer. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman know how many additional clerks have been taken on since war was declared?

Mr. BORLAND. My information, roughly, is about 12,000.

Mr. COX. I was under the impression it was about one clerk for every soldier that we had in France. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. Almost.

Mr. NORTON. That is along the line of Democratic efficiency.

Mr. COX. I do not care what line it is along.

Mr. WALSH. What does the gentleman from Missouri propose to do or to have done to remedy these various discrepancies?

Mr. BORLAND. The proposal of the "gentleman from Missouri" has been before the House once or twice, and I hope to have the cooperation of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has it.

Mr. BORLAND. I propose to have an eight-hour day in all of these departments, and release a number of clerks from the Interior and other departments to be used in speeding up the war preparations. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. How would that reduce the number? They would still keep these people there folding papers, and keep them an hour longer.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not believe it could fail to reduce the number unless the gentleman assumes that these clerks would not be employed after they were sent to the War Department. I do not think that would be the case. If it is, Congress would again take a hand.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman thinks they are all employed?

Mr. BORLAND. I think there is a surplus number of clerks in other departments in Washington, and they could be released by a standard eight-hour day being enforced by Congress. I think these clerks ought to be released and sent to the departments where the war speed-up work is necessary.

Mr. AYRES. Does not the gentleman think there is another duty that we could perform by informing all those who write asking to come here to accept these positions not to come? That is what I am doing.

Mr. BORLAND. That might be looked on as unpatriotic. I think the Government ought to have all of the employees it needs, and I have always voted for them, but I think every man who accepts employment under Uncle Sam and touches a dollar of his money has a sacred duty to perform an honest day's work. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. COX. If I recollect rightly, the other day, in discussing this question, the gentleman said if all of the clerks in the city were required to work a full eight hours a day it would save approximately $7,000,000 a year.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; assuming that this number of clerks was discharged; but in the present circumstances they will be added, as they would be, to the other departments.

Mr. COX. The gentleman says they have taken on an additional 12,000 since war was declared.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman made any mathematical calculation with a view of determining whether or not, if all of the clerks were required to actually work eight hours a day, there would have been any necessity for taking on any number of the 12,000 clerks?

Mr. BORLAND. There would still have been a necessity for taking on some additional clerks.

Mr. COX. How many?

Mr. BORLAND. Approximately 4,000 clerks will be released by this change from seven to eight hours a day on the pay roll as it existed before the war. On the present pay roll it might reduce those 12,000 clerks to from 6,000 to 8,000—possibly 5,000 clerks. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have read in my time an editorial from the Boston Herald, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNCLE SAM SHOULD GET HIS MONEY'S WORTH.

Word comes from Washington that a Congressman named BORLAND, representing the Kansas City district of Missouri, has brought down on his head a storm of condemnation. He has taken the unique position that the Government clerks in the National Capital should work harder for the salaries they now receive before Congress grants further increases. Even in the midst of a world war such an expression of opinion breathes revolution.

Congress has before it and expects to take early action on various bills to grant increases in compensation, ranging from 5 to 30 per cent, to every last person on the Government pay roll, an added expenditure conservatively estimated at $50,000,000 per annum. No one greatly objects to any organized attempt by a group of employees to obtain higher salaries, especially at this time. Mr. McAdoo has it in his power by a stroke of the pen to increase the wages of thousands of railroad men. Organized labor in countless industries attains its end by first submitting gracefully to the "compromise" increase which a Federal mediator decides upon. No one can blame the Government clerks for seeking their share of the distribution, even though the great majority of the American people, who do not wield the club of organization, but who eventually pay the bills, are forced to fight rising costs of living at the same old wage standard.

The truth is, however, that the clerks in the National Capital are the pampered darlings of Uncle Sam's service. They work but seven hours a day, and the records fail to disclose many cases of exhaustion. Their benovelent employer is liberal with his favors. Each clerk has 30 days vacation in the summer; he is entitled to 30 days sick leave each year; he has half-holidays on Saturdays for six months of the year; he has eight full legal holidays and a half day preceding each of these. Statisticians have computed that including the 52 Sundays a Washington clerk does not have to work on 137 days out of each 365.

No one knows all this better than Mr. BORLAND, of Missouri, who has been in Congress nine years. He believes that body should first increase the working day from seven hours to eight. There are now more than 70,000 civil-service employees in Washington (of course there are tens of thousands of others whose appointments are purely political), and adding one hour to the working day of these would provide the equivalent of 10,000 new clerks and answer the appeal which the Government is making for just that number.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Oklahoma to give me three minutes more.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. All of my time has been asked for, but I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. NORTON. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Then I will take mine back. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I regret that I can not yield. I have already yielded once or twice to the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, this war is going to involve great sacrifices that will reach down into every American home. It has already done so. Many men are fighting the advancing cost of living with little chance of bettering their wage scale. Many men have voluntarily come forward; thousands of others have been summoned by the mandate of the Nation to defend the flag. Those men have had to sacrifice their time, their business, their opportunities, their health, their career. Many of those men will come back mangled and maimed, with their earning power reduced, as a part of the sacrifice they have laid upon the country's altar. Thousands of those men will pay the last supreme sacrifice that a man can pay upon the altar of democracy. Thousands of parents throughout the land, like Abraham of old, have laid their sons upon the altar of their country. Yet we are told that we must not disturb the convenience of the clerks and the business men of Washington! Ah, they must be the only people who will be sheltered from all harm and given all of the advantages of this war. Their convenience must be consulted as to when they can go back and forth on the street cars. They must be let out at 4.15 o'clock in the afternoon. This city is crowded with business men who are brought here by these remarkable orders that have had to be made to prepare the Nation for this great struggle across the sea. These business men come down to these departments and attempt to transact business, and if they do not get through by the middle of the afternoon they must go to some crowded back room in a boarding house, for which they are paying a high price, and stay there for two or three days longer in order to consult the lordly convenience of some chief clerk in a department in Washington!

At 4 o'clock in the afternoon the clerk slams his desk shut, and the business public can wait for a solution of the great problems of preparedness. I say to you that we, as representatives of the people outside of Washington, not representatives of this overrepresented District of Columbia, but as representatives of the men upon whom the burden is falling in this war, have the first and primary duty, at least, of seeing that an honest day's work is given for every dollar expended by Uncle Sam. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER]. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I am loath to speak about a matter which will be a seeming criticism of the present administration and those who are advising him, but this drastic and uncalled-for order issued by Mr. Garfield yesterday morning is, in my judgment, the most costly error which could possibly have been made at this time, when everyone in the country has been under the strain and making every sacrifice which they have been called upon to make, cheerfully and freely, in the belief that conditions were satisfactory, and they were ready for further sacrifices, and greater effort is called for from day to day.

This action, taken this morning, which will throw out of employment at least three or four million people in the industries which are estopped, and those which are analogous to them which must shut down on account of this order is much to be regretted. But particularly am I interested in those fifty or sixty thousand employees in my own district in the Mohawk Valley in New York, who find themselves this morning without employment and, nothwithstanding Mr. Garfield's ephemeral idea that the manufacturers of the country as a patriotic duty should or would compensate these people during this period of nonemployment, they have no possible chance, in my judgment, to recover this loss. It is idle and foolish and absurd on the part of Mr. Garfield to assume any such proposition as this, for the facts are, Mr. Chairman, not 3 out of 10 manufacturers could pay their employees during this 15 days of idleness without serious financial embarrassment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does not the gentleman realize that there are not only a few thousand men who would be inconvenienced by this order on account of the war situation, but there are millions of the best blood of American manhood who have been inconvenienced in their earning power and suffered a great financial loss who are not only required to make that sacrifice one day out of a week for two months but it may be for three or four years yet to come?

Mr. SNYDER. I shall try to cover that a little further in my argument.

Intelligent workmen appreciate and recognize this fact as well as I do. Certainly they do not want to force a condition upon the manufacturers in this country which will not only close them down during the 15-day period covered in this order, but which will eventually put them out of business completely.

As a business man, I believe I understand the situation which prevails this morning throughout the United States, or at least in the manufacturing districts of the country, and having had more than 30 years' experience in connection with labor organizations and labor generally, I believe I understand their feelings this morning with regard to this matter. I want to say right here that it is my judgment that never will the people of the country forget those who have brought this situation upon them. [Applause.]

I have heretofore been proud to stand behind the President in practically every one of his war measures and have been willing to accept his advice, but I must say that never have I encountered a man in whose judgment I have had greater faith than I have in his up to yesterday morning. I can not conceive at this moment how a man who has shown the good judgment that he has on so many important questions could make the fatal error, in my judgment, that he has made in permitting Mr. Garfield to issue this order which will, I believe, bring about utter chaos and want and great suffering in the country.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman tell us the character of the industries in his district? What do they manufacture?

Mr. SNYDER. They manufacture knit goods that are now being made largely for the Government. They manufacture almost every kind of war material. The Savage Arms Co. are making the Lewis gun; the Remington Arms Co., at Ilion, N. Y.; the Remington Typewriter Co.; and an infinite number of manufacturers which I could go on and enumerate, but those are some of the principal ones. This is the largest center of the knit-goods industry in the whole United States. Every one of those people are out of work this morning.

It may have been necessary—and it probably was necessary—to do something to conserve coal for the suffering people of this country; but, Mr. Chairman, this talk about shutting down manufacturing plants in order to conserve coal for the householders is utter rot. The gentlemen in this House know that there is not 2 per cent of soft coal used in manufacturing plants for the purpose of making steam east of the Mississippi River which is used by the householders; and gentlemen of this House also know that not 2 per cent of the anthracite coal that is mined east of the Mississippi River is used for manufacturing purposes, so that so far as the question of stopping mills that have coal is concerned, it will in no way, from that standpoint, offer relief to domestic users. The only conceivable advantage that might be gained by the domestic user is that by shutting down all businesses in the country, except the railroads, it may be possible to relieve the congestion on the railroads to the extent that hard coal may be brought into the market in such quantities that the domestic users and householders may have adequate relief.

Finally, it is my belief that the whole difficulty under which we are struggling to-day is not a shortage of coal. It does not come from inability to mine coal, but the whole trouble is due to the fact of the breaking down of the railroad transportation in this country, due to a situation which has been brought in the past six months by differences of opinion between groups of men in the country who believe in Government ownership and groups of men who are opposed to that proposition, and this has led Mr. Garfield, in my judgment, to issue the order to cover up the situation referred to here. In other words, I believe that Mr. Garfield and his force are being made the goats, and by reason of this misunderstanding or disagreement at least thirty-five or forty millions of people in this country are going to be made to suffer, and we are giving our enemies great pleasure by showing them that within the first eight months of the war our transportation facilities have broken down to such an extent that we are unable to carry on our ordinary domestic internal business.

The people of this country, myself included, have been, I think, of the belief that it was right and proper to give the President this drastic power during the period of the war. This order, with its uncalled-for results, is evidence of the error of such action. I do not believe it should be made possible to put more of this sort of legislation in force. I am satisfied that had this matter been brought to the attention of Congress, no such drastic action would have been taken. The protest, which has been general from every part of the country, covering every industry and every walk of life, is to the effect that the action was unnecessary; it was uncalled for, and will bring about great suffering and unnecessary sacrifices on the part of the people.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SNYDER. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I am addressing a business man now. As a business man I would like to have the gentleman's judgment as to the amount of waste of fuel that will be involved in keeping plants in a condition to avoid freezing and for protection against fire. I would like to know the amount of waste that will be involved when we obey this order.

Mr. SNYDER. Well, in answer to that question I will say that in my own plant we use about 12 tons of coal a day to operate our engines, and from that consumption of coal we heat our factories with exhaust steam——

Mr. FESS. That is it.

Mr. SNYDER. The plant being stopped to-day will consume not less than 7 tons of coal to heat the plant with live steam, and it would be to lose in just that amount of coal that could have been used in a production that is badly needed. In other words, I will say that 75 per cent of the coal that is used to-day is lost to the country in productions of value.

Mr. FESS. Without an ounce of product?

Mr. SNYDER. Without an ounce of product to compensate for its loss.

Mr. FESS. I have that information from two factories in my district which use exhaust steam.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. PAIGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I will.

Mr. PAIGE. Will the gentleman tell me how much conservation of coal will be brought about to close down a mill that runs wholly or in part by water power?

Mr. SNYDER. That is a question that will be impossible for me to answer.

Mr. PAIGE. Will the gentleman state what the saving would be by making mills that burn more coal when they stop than when they are running; that is to say, that burn the by-products, shavings, and so forth, when running, and when stopped have to consume coal. Will the gentleman tell us what the saving is?

Mr. SNYDER. Nobody but with the inefficiency of a college professor will be able to answer that question. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I will.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman from Massachusetts has referred to woodworking plants. I saw a telegram yesterday from the superintendent of a woodworking plant in my district, which said that by the use of shavings only one-half a ton of coal a day was consumed to operate, and if the plant shut down, it would take four tons to keep the plant warm enough to keep the sprinkler system from freezing.

Mr. SNYDER. I will answer this question first. It is my judgment that Mr. Garfield knew it would be a great loss to the country when he made this order in the way he did to stop plants such as those to which the gentleman refers, but this whole order is a camouflage of the railroad management, and it is necessary, they believe, to discontinue shipments from every point in the United States during those days in order to clear up the railroad congestion, and that is the principle reason for the order, in my judgment.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman's opinion as to whether or not this would have a stimulating or depressing effect upon these hundreds of thousands of employees who will be out of work for several days, when the next liberty loan is attempted to be floated and they are besought to purchase those bonds?

Mr. SNYDER. Nothing, in my judgment, could have been done by this administration to put a more deterrent effect upon the sale of liberty bonds or upon the subscriptions to war-relief activities than this particular order that we are discussing here now.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. My time is pretty near up.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman spoke about this order being used as camouflage to cover up railroad management. Would not "railroad mismanagement" be more correct?

Mr. SNYDER. I accept the correction.

Having criticized the action taken, it seems that I should offer what I believe would have been a solution of the matter. It is my belief that a supreme effort should have been made to operate the railroads of the country and a supreme effort should have been made to speed up the coal production, both of which, in my judgment, would have been successful by the management of these two great essentials, had they been put into the hands of men of known capabilities, who would have surrounded themselves with men capable of bringing about this result [applause], and this would have, in my judgment, made it unnecessary to have brought on the country the present disaster.

Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained to make this statement, and in closing I want to say that I believe every word that I have said, and in the future I shall proceed along the lines suggested here. I am still of the belief that, notwithstanding all the errors that are being made, that wiser councils will prevail and that order will come out of chaos and some one in the country big enough will be found to take hold of these great affairs and lead us to victory. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. One minute.

Mr. SNYDER. In the one minute left I want to bring another matter to the attention of the House.

On June 1, 1917, I sent a telegram to our esteemed Democratic leader in which I said:

> A great many notes for the purchase of liberty bonds will have to be given to the banks; many of them will have to be renewed. The banks in this section of the country are offering to loan money at 4 per cent, so that the people may buy these bonds. It seems to me that notes that are given for the purchase of Liberty bonds should be exempt from stamp tax. What do you think about this?

The Democratic leader advised me that he thought that he would take it up in the conference, but nothing came of it. What position do we find ourselves in to-day? The banks in my section of the country, that worked overtime and employed extra help and spent their money in their enthusiasm to distribute their quota of this loan, have taken millions of dollars in loans. In some cases they accepted from their depositors demand notes. They now find themselves in a position every three months of having to put—one bank in particular—$200 worth of 2-cent stamps on the back of a million dollars of notes that go for rediscount. That amount of stamps on a million dollars makes $800 a year, and since the reserve bank has raised the rediscount rate to 4 per cent the banks are not only forced to do all the work for nothing, but they are to pay 2 cents on every hundred dollars' worth of rediscount. And, my friends, I believe that that alone will dampen the ardor of the most enthusiastic Government bond salesman that this country could find in any search it might make. And I desire to ask the Democratic leader if he will not give this matter serious consideration and see if it can not be corrected so that we can have the benefit of the enthusiasm and patriotism of our bankers throughout the country without their actually spending their money and work besides. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of this House to a few concrete examples of the utter folly of the order issued by the President of the United States and promulgated through his Fuel Administrator, shutting down the industries of this country, and to show that instead of its being a saving of fuel it is resulting in absolute waste. Illustrating this proposition, I desire to read a telegram I received this morning from Finley P. Mount, president of the Advance Rumely Co., the greatest manufacturing establishment in producing farm tractors in the world, in which he says:

> Trust you will use all efforts to procure immediate revocation order issued National Fuel Administrator. Order will result in waste rather than saving of fuel. It requires 50 tons coal to keep our plant at 35 degrees and protect from freezing when weather is 10 above outside. It only requires 5 to 10 more tons per day to operate. If not permitted to operate this 50 tons is absolutely wasted.

There is a concrete example of where, by reason of this order, 50 tons of coal are wasted in this one institution for the purpose of saving 10 tons, a net loss, if you please, of 40 tons without any results so far as the manufacturer is concerned, and not considering the men thrown out of employment.

There is another concrete example to which I wish to call your attention and it is best illustrated by a telegram I received this morning from William J. Whinery, representing one of the greatest manufacturing plants in the Calumet region, where there are more than 50,000 men to-day idle by reason of this order, suffering, if you please, from cold.

Order stopping industries for five days has thrown this entire country into business panic. Factories working on munitions under time limits for deliveries are up in the air as to whether to shut down or not. There is a rumor here that Congress is considering the withdrawal of the order. Please advise immediately.

I had to advise them this morning that the order had not been withdrawn or modified.

And right here I wish to call your attention to this fact, that there are thousands and thousands of laboring men in the Calumet region, about Indiana Harbor, Gary, and Hammond, that have no places in which to live except in the factories where they are working, where they have to sleep in congested apartments by reason of the want of housing facilities, these men depending, if you please, for the warmth of their bodies at this time, when the thermometer is 15 degrees below zero out there, on employment in these factories, and suffering, if you please, by reason of this inconsiderate order.

And what is true in reference to the situation at Gary, Indiana Harbor, and Hammond is likewise true in all the great commercial and manufacturing centers of this country. Instead of saving coal for the purpose of producing warmth to the poor, they are absolutely destroying the opportunity for them to have a place where they can keep their bodies warm throughout the day. And, if you please, it is resulting not only in the waste of the man power of this country, every bit of which should be employed immediately, but it is disorganizing business for the future, as in this great Rumely concern, whose business it is to manufacture these tractors that are now so largely used in the great corn belts and grain belts of this country, and in manufactories of such implements as plows and reapers and mowers, that are made by the great harvester concerns of this country, and that are now needed and being demanded in every section of this country to take care of the grain which has to be harvested, and for which so much encouragement has been offered. Listen to this telegram that I have just received from the Blount Plow Works, of Evansville, Ind.:

To win the war we must have food and cotton and sugar; to have them farmers must have implements. Our trade is in the South. Southern farmers are begging for plows and repairs. We are now over 30 days behind on deliveries. Our plant, equipped with wet sprinkling systems, requires as much coal to shut down as to operate.

So that you see that it ramifies to all extents and to all business employments. I dare say, that if by some magic power the Kaiser could have issued an order by some intrigue closing these factories as quickly as this order has closed them, a mighty pall of disaster would have fallen on this country of ours. But such action of this arch enemy would bring no greater disaster than has befallen our country by reason of the action of the President of the United States; so that I say that it is high time that this body, composed of representatives of the people of the United States, should voice its protest against this order, that can result in no good, and that can only result in indescribable injury. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, the matter to which I call attention is entirely alien to the bill under consideration, but it is one in which I feel a very deep interest.

Several weeks ago the Surgeon General of the United States, Gen. Gorgas, made a report to the War Department as to the condition of the camps throughout the Nation as well as the condition of the health of the soldiers encamped therein. There were many things in that report that excited a great deal of apprehension throughout the Nation and which caused me personally great concern. I made effort to get this report from the Surgeon General's Office by correspondsence. I understand that a number of other Members of this body made similar efforts, but none was successful. Because of such inability, as I understand, some two weeks ago, on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], this report was by unanimous consent made a House document, with instructions that it should be printed and put at the disposition of the Members. Since that time I have called daily at the document room seeking this document, but always to be denied. Yesterday I was rather nonchalantly informed that sometimes it took months for these reports to get to the document room.

Gentlemen of the committee, the people of this Nation and the Representatives in this House are entitled to all information regarding the condition of these camps. [Applause.] I do not charge that this report has been suppressed, but I do charge that no Member of this body has been able to see it. I regret exceedingly to be put in an attitude of criticism, but there is no question in which the Nation is more vitally interested than it is in the health of the soldiers in these encampments. [Applause.]

So far as I am concerned, I shall never hesitate to criticize existing evils when my criticism might suggest a remedy. [Applause.] I would be unworthy of a place in this body if I should do otherwise. I do not know, beyond newspaper reports, just how serious the condition may be; but if we have boys in the encampments who are being sacrificed, they ought to be sacrificed for the country and not by the country. [Applause.]

I believe that some action should be taken with reference to this report. I believe that some process should issue from this House whereby the Members of the House of Representatives will be permitted to see what the Surgeon General says the condition is, especially as his suggestions are made after a personal inspection of these camps. Up to this time we have not been so permitted. I am frank to say that I am unfamiliar with the proper procedure to get that report into the document room, as the House ordered, but it ought to be put there and it ought to be put there without delay. It will be of no service to the soldiers in the encampments to have a report put there some time next summer which ought to be there now. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I understood at the time the report of Gen. Gorgas was made that it was very offensive to the Secretary of War. That may be the explanation of why it has not been published.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, work must win this war and nothing else. It is our factories that are carrying on the industries of this country, that are the life-blood of this country. There have been attempts to destroy them by explosions by our enemies. To stop the operation of our factories by an enemy is murder of the Nation. To stop those factories by the action of a patriot is suicide. [Applause.] It is those factories that must win this war.

They tell us we need coal. We can save coal for those factories by running them, not by stopping them. We can save coal here in this Chamber if we use less heat, and some of us think it is too hot here sometimes. [Laughter.] Our boys in France have no heat. We can save coal if we choose to live as our grandfathers did, with one room warm in the house during the winter. We can save coal if these lights up there in the ceiling and around in the galleries during daylight, which are being paid for, were not burning. We could save coal to an enormous extent if four out of the five electric lights in the streets and in the houses were cut off. We can save coal by temporarily closing places of amusement and by shutting off the lights in the shops and in the advertisements and by stopping the manufacture of unnecessary articles—musical boxes or what not. We want our men and our skilled labor in necessary factories and on railroads to be at work, and when we close or reduce the force in other factories we can use their skilled mechanics on the repair of locomotives and cars. There are skilled mechanics also in our Army, and we could use them.

What has encouraged our allies and disheartened our enemies was the belief that America is able and willing to do everything in solving the world problem. Now our Nation has confessed an impotence that not one of the nations abroad has confessed after three years of bloodshed and privation—not one.

London and Paris are dark at night. I do not ask that we shall be as dark. Saving will do much. In England not a private automobile is running, because they are being used for war purposes. All that is for saving fuel. We must also collect fuel that is tied up in cars in yards. There are coal cars that can not be unloaded and there are 217 ships waiting in the harbor of New York to be loaded. There are a million soldiers who are ready to turn in and load those ships, to clear those yards, and unload those cars. There are delivery wagons for shops that can be commandeered to distribute coal when necessary. America has the energies and abilities. It is direction and encouragement, not stoppage, that she asks. [Applause.] We can clear the roads, we can repair the engines, we can run our factories. If man labor is deficient, we can do as they have done abroad, where I saw shells larger than those on the table in front of us, shells that no one man could lift, being made on lathes and planing machines that were run by women, and where I saw a cordite powder factory with 20,000 employees, and 13,000 of them were women. Women collect the tickets; are conductors on the omnibuses and on the trains. We, as a Nation, are ready if we are only given the opportunity to work. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield one minute to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I was very much impressed with what the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] said, and I want to add my indorsement to what he said as to the publicity of the Surgeon General's report. [Applause.] I rose specially, however, to state that the document to which he referred went to the document room last night and is now available for distribution. [Applause.] I can not understand why it has been delayed. I want to express the hope that the Printing Office, or whoever caused the delay, will not hereafter cause any such delay. I do not believe there is any document more important to the House, to the soldiers, and to the people of the country than that document, and I believe it ought to be given publicity. As I said, I wish to indorse what the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] said. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut a like amount of time.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I have come to the House this morning from a sick bed to which I have been confined for two days, and I may not find myself physically able to consume the time so generously allotted to me by the gentlemen in charge of time on both sides of the Chamber.

In the interest of a more orderly presentation of what I wish to say, and also in the interest of conserving my strength, I ask that I be not interrupted in the first part of my remarks, until I reach the point of describing some of the exhibits that I have brought on the floor.

In my judgment the United States and our allies could whip Germany and her allies in a fair fight with naked fists if the Germans would agree to fight that way and keep to the agreement. Unfortunately there are no present indications of such an agreement being made or kept. Much as we should like to bask in the perennial smile of Billiken, the god of things as they ought to be, we are compelled for the present to face the grim visage of Mars, the god of war.

We can not be too often reminded that we are pitted against the mightiest military machine the world has ever known and in the greatest war of all recorded time. The question that now absorbs the interest of every one of us is, how can we as a Nation most effectively perform our part in the struggle?

If this war has demonstrated one thing more clearly than another, it is that a preponderance of metal wisely used will win it. It is a machine-made war, designed in Germany. It is a war of metals; and the sooner we realize that fact the better. All previous calculations as to the amount of arms and ammunition required went into the discard as obsolete soon after the war began. Even the general staff of Germany very early in the war multiplied by four its most liberal former estimate of necessary matériel. The allies had much less than Germany to begin with, but amounts far beyond all previous calculations had been produced by France and Great Britain before we entered the struggle. True, they had help, important as to certain things, from the private manufacturers of this country.

It is true as it is commonplace that we entered the war in a sad state of unpreparedness. As to who was to blame for that unfortunate condition it would serve no good purpose to discuss in this connection. While I make no claim of unusual prescience, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD covering seven years of my service here will fairly acquit me of any delinquency in this connection. [Applause.] Others saw the need of preparation as I did and called attention to it more forcefully than I could, and urged that the things lacking should be supplied. It is only fair to say, however, that if it be a distinction, I think it belongs to me of being the first Member of the American Congress and one of the first men in the country to not only call attention to a general lack of military preparedness but to state in what respect we were lacking and what were the essential first steps necessary to a reasonable state of preparedness. [Applause.]

Through a series of remarks running over two years I have striven by speech and ocular demonstration, in season and out of season, to make plain to the membership of this House what those essentials are, and how best to procure them. Many of you will recall my numerous talks on arms, ammunition, and the gauges, dies, jigs, and fixtures necessary to produce them. My colleagues on the Military Affairs Committee long ago dubbed me "JIGS TILSON," but I kept at it, because I knew I was right. [Applause.] Now, everybody agrees that I was right and that if my advice had been followed earlier we should now all feel a little more comfortable as we look across the seas.

We shall not lack for men to win this war. The spirit in which the selective-draft law has been accepted by the young men of the country upon whom it operates has been both comforting and inspiring. We have the men, the very best on earth, and the cream of them are coming to the colors. The life of each one of them is precious beyond all words, so that we who are in a measure responsible must see to it that not one single precious life is sacrificed unnecessarily. You will ask how we can prevent it. One of the first things to be done is to be sure that our soldier boys over there and here are abundantly supplied with munitions of war, especially weapons, including arms, aeroplanes, tanks, and a superabundance of ammunition. All these they must have and as speedily as possible.

What, then, do our forces need to make their efforts most effective? A great number and variety of things and very large quantities of most of them. First, they need guns, then more guns, and then still more guns, many types, lengths, and calibers of guns. A partial recital of the list of them would sound like the outpouring of the rats in Browning's wonderful child story, "The Pied Piper of Hamelin." Big guns, little guns, long guns, short guns, trench guns, mortars, howitzers, slender seventy-fives, fat old Berthas, pistols, and revolvers—enough of both Colts and Smith & Wessons—rifles and bayonets almost without number of both Springfields and Enfields, machine guns, too many to count, Lewis guns, Benet-Merciers, Colts, Vickers, Marlins, Brownings, Chaucats, and Hotchkiss. We must have all these in order to get enough in time.

Our forces must have cartridges and shells, 30-30s by the billion, 1-pounders, 75s, and so on up to the biggest shell made—shrapnel, high explosives, gas shells, shells that explode by time fuses, shells that explode by impact, shells that explode both ways, shells that explode by delayed detonation.

They must have tanks—caterpillar tanks or armored motor cars, as they are called officially. These they must have in the larger and smaller types, enough and well equipped for their deadly work.

They must have aeroplanes enough to put out the eyes of the enemy and drop bombs upon him in his blindness. They need training planes, scouting planes, fighting planes, bombing planes, different types for different purposes, planes that will do the kinds of work now done by such machines as the Nieuport, the S. P. A. D., the Handley-Page, the Caproni, and the swift-flying German albatross. Yes; and go them one better.

They must have mountains of bombs to hurl upon the enemy from the trenches and rain upon him from the skies—large bombs, small bombs, demolition bombs, incendiary bombs, lachrymatory bombs, lethal bombs, bombs to be used against personnel, bombs that destroy by concussion, and bombs that destroy by fragmentation; bombs to be used over land and bombs to be used over water, bombs to be dropped from aeroplanes, bombs to be hurled from guns and mortars, bombs to be fired from the muzzle of the rifle, and bombs to be thrown by hand; rifle grenades, hand grenades, chemical grenades; and the end is not yet.

All these things are necessary and must be provided if we would win the war speedily and without the futile sacrifice of thousands of our brave soldiers. The lack of many or all of these things caused the collapse of Russia, apparently beyond all hope of recovery. Scarcity of them caused the sad disaster in northern Italy. A fair supply of them has held the enemy in northern France and Belgium, and an abundance of them will defeat him. These things will cost money, a lot of it, but not so much as if we attempt to do without them. Best of all, they will win the war. Next best, they will save human life, and "What shall a man give in exchange for his life?" I hope that everybody in this country, from President Wilson down, will speedily come to realize the supreme importance of this matter. [Applause.]

We read and hear much comment concerning a new department of munitions. At the present time the President seems to oppose it. We may have made mistakes heretofore in creating new departments of the Government without sufficient reason. In our present situation, however, I believe we should have a separate department of munitions, whether we call its head a secretary, a minister, or a director, provided he is subject to the direction of the President without intervening authority. [Applause.] It would emphasize the transcendent importance of this matter just now, and in my judgment would effect a much needed coordination not otherwise possible under present conditions. It would be better to dispense with the valuable services of half the present Cabinet, if that were necessary in order to save the funds to establish such a department.

In a series of three speeches last session I brought before the House a considerable array of arms, ammunition, and other articles used in the present war. In the first, the major part of my remarks were directed to rifles and machine guns. In the second, I went further and introduced the subject of bombs, submitting one or two samples. The third dealt with the use of weapons in and from the air, with special reference to our great aviation program, and incidentally the defense against poisonous gases by the use of gas masks. To-day I wish to go a little further along the same general line, but with special reference to weapons used in, from, and against trenches, now known as trench warfare.

The universal use of trenches in the present war in a way and to a degree never known before is not an invention or a discovery. It is a natural instinct. Self-preservation is the first law of life. The present inglorious trench warfare, the burrowing in the ground of human underground animals, is the logical, natural, inevitable result of that primal law worked out under present-day conditions. A study of the development of the use of earthworks in war is a most interesting one, but time will not permit even a reference to it here. Suffice it to say that in general it coincides quite accurately with the development of firearms and explosives.

While the use of the trench came instinctively, the development of the trench has called for the highest inventive genius of man, striving to make the trench safe for our own troops and unsafe for the enemy. I have brought before you a rough-draft typical section of a trench, very much foreshortened, as you will see from the position of the supporting trench. I have brought it in order that when I present a weapon to be used in it you will understand to what I refer. In general, the front trench is a deep, narrow ditch, in its general direction parallel to the enemy, with traverses at frequent intervals to prevent enfilading. The communicating trench is a zigzag, like forked lightning, running back to the supporting trench. These traverses and zigzags are not fanciful or arbitrary; they are absolutely necessary, and the only things that would serve the purpose. The communicating trenches, having a general direction perpendicular to the front trench, have to zigzag in order to prevent a raking fire from the front, while the first-line trench has to be traversed in order to prevent enfilading by the enemy from a distant point in his line or by troops gaining a foothold in adjoining parts of our own line.

First I will take the rifle. I hold in my hand a modified Enfield rifle built by the Remington Co. and chambered for British ammunition. It looks almost exactly like our United States model of 1917, as you will see as I place beside it one of the very first improved Enfields chambered for our ammunition. It was made by Winchester and sent to me last summer. Except for sniping, the rifle is used within the trench mostly to carry the bayonet and to fire rifle grenades. Let us assume that our troops have gained a foothold at intervals in the front-line trench of the enemy. It then becomes highly important to find out who the neighbors are across the traverse on both sides. This is done by the aid of a periscope. Then begins what they call "mopping up." Two men with rifles stand at the traverse, one behind the other. They stand with bayonets fixed. The two men with bayonets are backed up by two grenadiers, who come along behind them with hand grenades such as these, and hurl them across both the first and second traverses. There are four men behind them with gunny sacks loaded with bombs. At first they had a fancy carrier, like a knapsack, to carry the bombs in, but they found that when a man was killed, as he frequently was, it was difficult to get the carrier off; so they found that the gunny sacks answered the purpose better and were cheaper.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman give us an idea of the destructive qualities of those bombs?

Mr. TILSON. Perhaps it would be clearer if I took one article at the beginning and went through with that.

Mr. AUSTIN. And please state the size of them as you go along.

Mr. TILSON. The one I hold in my hand is the well-known Mills or English hand grenade. It is the simplest grenade. It is as large as a big California lemon and about the same shape. It was made at first of cast iron, and, I should say, it weighs about 20 ounces loaded ready for firing.

The idea some people have is that men stand in the trench and throw them forward toward the enemy, but that is a misconception and is impracticable. They are not used in that way. They are used lengthwise of the trench, either in "mopping up" or on the defensive against a counterattack coming down the communicating trenches. If you have taken a front trench of the enemy and are "mopping it up," and the enemy is coming down the communicating trenches in a counterattack against you, these grenades are very useful. You do not have to throw them very far. The average length that they are thrown is from 15 to 25 yards.

Mr. RUCKER. What makes them explode?

Mr. TILSON. A time fuse. Here is a safety device. A man gets ready to throw; he takes hold of the safety device, pulls it out, and then he has to hold it, because if he releases it it immediately fires; but he holds it until he is ready to throw it, and then he hurls it. Five seconds from the time it is released it goes off. That is the Mills grenade in its simplest form.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is that what the gentleman meant when he used the term "delayed detonation"?

Mr. TILSON. No; the delayed detonator is used in the larger shell, which is made not to fire instantaneously on impact, but after it has penetrated the ground or a building, especially a building. If you drop a large bomb from an aeroplane, you do not want it to explode when it hits the roof, because the explosion would all be above the building. The delayed detonation would permit it to drop down many feet below and get into the middle of the building; or if used against the trench, it permits the shell to penetrate the earth a distance of 8 or 10 feet, so as to cause terrific destruction and a large crater.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This bomb which the gentleman has just been describing does not explode on impact?

Mr. TILSON. No; it has a time fuse.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Explodes five seconds afterwards?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. It is a five-second time fuse.

Mr. KEARNS. When one explodes, what is the radius of death?

Mr. TILSON. I have here in my hand fragments gathered up from the explosion of one of our own type of grenades, which I hold in my hand, which is somewhat similar to the Mills grenade, but which our Ordnance Department thinks is an improvement. We call it the defensive hand grenade, Mark I.

It consists of a malleable-iron body, containing the bursting charge and bouchon assembly, comprising the safety pin, safety cover, actuating lever, striker, primer, time fuse, and detonator. The bouchon assembly screws into the body with the detonator extending into the bursting charge.

To operate it, the grenade is grasped firmly with the thumb across the actuating lever and the safety pin removed by a quick pull, allowing the safety cover to fall free. The arm is drawn back in a vertical plane and then brought forward sharply in a straight arm, overhand throw, keeping in the same plane and using the shoulder and body as much as possible in the motion.

As the grenade leaves the hand the thumb naturally engages the actuating lever, releasing the striker, which fires the primer. The time fuse is ignited, and five seconds later the bursting charge is detonated.

The principal safety feature of our grenade, not found in the "Mills" type, is that the "Mills" is completely armed when the safety pin is withdrawn, and the moment the operator's grip is released, whether through design or accident, the striker operates. In bombing, the operator is under fire and in cramped quarters, so that casualties are quite frequent with the Mills type of grenade, due to the operator's fumbling or dropping the grenade through his being hit or interfered with after withdrawing the safety pin. Our actuating lever, which engages the firing point of the striker, will not release the same unless swung to the side. In tests of dropping or throwing our grenade to the ground it has been found that the striker is released less than once in a hundred times.

The British commission, when it came over here, told us of the astonishing number of men who had been killed through accident in that way on Salisbury Plain, where they train their grenadiers. If I told you the number, it would seem incredible. Our design section of trench warfare in the Ordnance Department thought it would remedy that and made one a bit different, as I have already described to you.

Malleable iron gives better fragmentation than cast iron, as it is tougher and does not tend to pulverize. A series of tests have shown that whereas cast-iron grenades weighing approximately 1 pound gave an average of 556 fragments when exploded with the standard charge, malleable-iron grenades gave an average of 198 fragments, which proves that the fragments of the malleable-iron grenade were of larger area and would prove more effective. Malleable iron gives better penetration results than cast iron. Having approximately twice the tensile strength, the bursting pressure is greater, imparting to the fragments a higher initial velocity. The fragments being larger, would possess greater kinetic energy, assuming the same initial velocity; the initial velocity being much higher than in the case of cast iron, the penetration qualities are correspondingly higher. A malleable-iron grenade exploded with a standard charge in an oak barrel with heads removed, having three-quarter-inch staves, gave 73 complete piercings and numerous penetrations of various depths in the wood.

I am not able to answer exactly the gentleman from Ohio as to the radius of death, but from the test last referred to the gentleman can see how forceful it is. After all, as I explained a few moments ago, these are used only against men in the trenches. You throw them over the next traverse, or the next but one, to destroy the defender or the attacker, as the case may be, but you do not use them in an attack in the open. If you do, you are as liable to be killed as you are liable to kill the other fellow. They do not use that particular type of bomb in that way, but use it against men in the trenches.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. What is the death radius, or the radius of destruction, of our largest bombs?

Mr. TILSON. The largest bomb that we use against personnel has a danger circle of half a mile in diameter.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. How extensively are those being manufactured and used?

Mr. TILSON. They are manufactured in considerable number. I know that many thousands of them are being produced.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. A radius of half a mile?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; they are dangerous at half a mile, as you and I would think of danger, though perhaps not in a strictly military sense. I do not mean that they would kill everyone in a half-mile circle, for there would not be enough fragments to do that.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. What is the weight of the largest bomb?

Mr. TILSON. About a hundred pounds is the largest one to be used against personnel, but they run up to 500 pounds in demolition bombs, and worse may follow.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Are they now being employed in Europe?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes. There is one thing in which we think we have an advantage. In the Barlow bomb we have a bomb that explodes above the surface of the earth, and, as against personnel, that is a great factor.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. What is the method of conveying those—by aeroplane?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; those bombs are entirely by aeroplanes. I have some here.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I wish the gentleman would elaborate upon that, because I think there is a misapprehension in respect to it throughout the country.

Mr. TILSON. Very well. Here are some additional facts in regard to the Barlow bomb that I am willing to give in response to the gentleman's very courteous request.

The Barlow heavy drop bomb is the fragmentation bomb used, and is designed for use against troops in the field or on the march, particularly when in massed formation; against personnel located in camps, cantonments, or rest billets; and, as the bomb will explode above water, against landing parties or small boats.

The efficiency of the bomb is secured by mechanically causing the detonation when the explosive war head is between 4 and 5 feet above the ground, and none of the energy of the detonation is lost by being buried in the earth. The bomb has a diameter of 6 inches and length of 80 inches when in the normal or safe position and a length of approximately 15 feet when extended in firing position. The weight of the bomb is approximately 95 pounds, of which 12 pounds represents the weight of the explosive and 83 pounds the weight of the container. This bomb also embodies a safety feature in that the detonator is carried out of the high explosive charge until the moment of release. The detonation above the ground is obtained by means of an extrusion rod operated by compressed air at the moment of release. At the extreme forward end of the extrusion rod is carried a rifled barrel, loaded with a .30-30 service cartridge, with a firing pin which discharges the cartridge at the instant of contact. The bullet from the cartridge detonates the fulminate of mercury detonator carried in the opposite end of the extrusion rod, which in turn detonates the high explosive carried in the war head. The war head is a hollow steel cup 14⅝ inches long, with an outside diameter of 6 inches and walls one-half inch thick, and it is the fragmentation of this shell that gives the bomb its effectiveness.

I have described already the safety device in this small hand grenade, which does not work until after the side motion. I desire to call attention to one other difference between this and the Mills grenade. The Mills grenade originally was made of cast iron, for, as you may know, or may not know, malleable iron is practically an American industry. So England made these grenades of cast iron. If a large force, a heavy detonation, is put into it, it blows the cast iron into powder, so they had to put in a low order of detonation, with a small circle of death as the result. As soon as the Americans took it up they at once used malleable iron. It fragments well, stands the strain, so that you can get a very high order of detonation, and, therefore, we think we have a bomb that is very greatly improved. I am informed that already 30,000,000 of these are under way. Few jigs or dies or gauges are required to make them, because they are of rough manufacture, as you will see, and therefore easily made, and that is the case with a number of these other things. The trench-warfare section of the Ordnance Department has a motto upon which it proceeds—"Anything that is cheap and nasty." The motto is full of meaning: First, it must be nasty; that is, if it does not accomplish the dirty business, if it is not nasty, there is no use fooling with it; if they can not be made reasonably cheap, then we can not make enough of them. So we have been working on this type, and have produced them, I think, for about 10 cents.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. REED. Do these corrugations there determine the number and size of the fragments practically absolutely?

Mr. TILSON. No. If you take a piece of chocolate marked with corrugations like that and drop it on the floor it will not break up according to the lines at all. I have often wondered why not, but it does not seem to do so, and it is the same way with these things.

Mr. ROWE. Those are to help the hand in throwing them.

Mr. TILSON. I think it is largely to give a grip to the hand, to give surface friction. The next size grenade that is used is the rifle grenade. This is our service rifle, model 1903, Springfield, so called. You see this muzzle piece here. It is the discharger and is put on to fire the grenade from. This is called the V. B. [Viviénne-Bessiere] rifle grenade, consisting of a malleable-iron body, containing the primer, time fuse, detonator, and bursting charge, and is fired from a discharger affixed to the muzzle of the service rifle.

The "propellant" is the standard service cartridge, the ball of which, passing through a central tube in the grenade body, actuates the striker, functioning in turn the primer and time fuse. The gases following the bullet propel the grenade a maximum distance of 225 to 250 yards. The detonator is fired by the time fuse eight seconds after the grenade leaves the discharger, detonating the bursting charge and shattering the body. A maximum range is secured through an elevation of 45° and shorter ranges by increasing the angle of the elevation. The plunging fire obtained from these elevations has proven very effective.

It can be used from a trench over against the other fellow's trench, if you are that close to it. They are a little more expensive than the others, but they also are made of malleable iron and are reasonably cheap. One of these dischargers is allotted to about 1 soldier in 10, and will last indefinitely. They cost probably about $4.

The next size is the 3-inch Stokes shell, used by the British. They have used a great many of these, and very effectively. At the rear end there is a cartridge like a shotgun shell, which explodes the powder rings which are here on this projection. Powder rings, as needed, according to the distance to be covered, are fired by sparks coming out through these holes after firing the shotgun shell.

The gun in which this is used, known as the Stokes gun, is about as cheap as it is possible to make. It may be likened to a length of sewer pipe with a firing pin at one end and a plate at the back to keep it from ramming into the ground. The way the shells are fired after the gun is set up is just to pick the shell up, drop it in, and, like that old comic song we used to hear, it "walks right in and walks right out again." That is just what happens. As soon as it hits the firing pin at the bottom it is fired, and it comes right out again. It has an effective range of about 1,200 yards and can be fired at the rate of 30 shots per minute.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. PURNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman a question about the gun of which he was speaking. Is that a permanent attachment, or can it be removed and the gun used without it?

Mr. TILSON. It can be attached to any Springfield rifle. Of course, we had to make two types, one to fit our new model of 1917.

Mr. PURNELL. Is each soldier equipped with that attachment, or just 1 in 10?

Mr. TILSON. About 1 in 10 fires the rifle grenade.

Mr. AUSTIN. What size gun fires the Stokes shell?

Mr. TILSON. Three-inch, but it is a gun only by courtesy. It is not a gun in the same sense that we speak of a real gun.

Mr. ESCH. It is more like a piece of gas pipe.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; or sewer pipe.

Mr. CRISP. Is the propelling force of the Stokes shell in the shell itself?

Mr. TILSON. No; the propelling force is in these powder rings around here. That sends it on its way. It has a fuse that explodes it. The explosive force is inside the shell, and there is a fuse here that fires it when it arrives.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. What is that explosive force?

Mr. TILSON. Well, I do not know that I could tell exactly what they are going to use, T. N. T. perhaps. At any rate, it is a very high explosive they are going to use.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman from Oklahoma yield 30 minutes?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman from Oklahoma asked me to represent him, and stated that I could yield Mr. TILSON five minutes additional if he should wish that time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How much time has the gentleman from Connecticut used?

The CHAIRMAN. He has used 40 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then I yield him—how much more time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. TILSON. I should like to have 15 minutes, if I could get it and if it will not impede the progress of business too much.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma yields 5 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas 10 minutes, so the gentleman is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Let me call attention to the fact that, instead of being made out of steel, as the Stokes shell is in England, we are now making them out of malleable iron. You will note also that instead of having them polished from one end to the other, this being the only part that touches the gun, we are going to polish just the ends, the parts that bear, and save a good deal of cost. The rest of it will be rough, just as it is cast. These samples are of malleable iron and I am assured will explode with just as great effect as steel.

I have brought here some demolition bombs made for the purpose of dropping from the sky. The demolition bombs are used against buildings, railways, depots, bridges, and so forth, and depend for the execution of their purpose upon the detonation of the charge of high explosive and not on the fragmentation of the shell.

The shell or container for the high explosive is made of steel of sufficient tensile strength to insure penetration through roofs of buildings or other objects to be destroyed.

The bombs are detonated by the contact of the nose striking the target. They are made with stream lines and with four stabilizers at the rear end, located parallel with the horizontal axis of the bombs at an angle of 90° from each other, to insure a uniform trajectory. The center of gravity is forward of the center to insure striking on the nose.

Two things have been kept in mind in the design of these bombs, namely: That they be as dangerous and as effective as possible against the enemy and to be as safe as possible for loading, handling, and carrying on airplanes. The fulminate detonator is carried in the extreme rear end of the bomb out of the charge of high explosive, and is held in this position by a safety pin until the moment of release from the plane.

These bombs are being manufactured in five sizes, as follows:

	Weight explosive.	Weight container.	Total weight.	Diameter.	Length.
				Inches.	Inches.
Mark I	50	42	92	7⅞	48
Mark II	10	14	24	4½	26
Mark III	25	22	47	6½	36
Mark IV	130	100	230	11½	54
Mark V	300	200	500	16½	60

This smallest bomb that I have brought here costs when alive and ready to drop about $25.

Mr. AUSTIN. Out of what material is it made?

Mr. TILSON. Out of steel, in order to get the greatest possible destructive force. The same thing not charged, but weighted for experimentation and for practice on our aeroplanes, costs about $11. We need a great number of them to be used by our aeroplanes for practice. One of our very wide-awake young officers in the design section has devised this affair. I think he must have watched his baby make mud pies and have gotten his inspiration from that. At any rate, he has made of concrete an imitation bomb, the same weight exactly, balanced exactly the same, and which, it is believed, will serve every purpose for practice that one of the $11 bombs will serve. I am told it can be made for 94 cents. The difference in cost will soon run into money. In the end of this concrete affair is placed a cartridge like a shotgun shell, loaded with some smoke-producing substance, so that when it drops it will make as much smoke as possible, so as to appear as much like a real shell exploding as possible. This one [indicating] is also a demolition bomb and might be called a companion piece to the Barlow bomb, which I submitted some time last session, except that this is used for demolition work, while the Barlow bomb is used against personnel.

Just a few words about incendiary bombs, of which I have not a sample here to-day. These bombs are to be used for incendiary purposes against factories, depots, camps, or any places it is desired to destroy by fire, and are made in two types—intensive type and scatter type.

The intensive type, our Mark II, is to be used against buildings or in places where an intense compact flame or fire is to be concentrated at a particular point. The exterior form and construction is similar to that of the Mark I demolition bomb, with a steel nose of sufficient tensile strength to insure penetration through roofs, and so forth, without rupture, and an afterbody composed of one-thirty-second inch thick zinc. It is filled with a solidified oil and with a can of thermit to be used for ignition purposes. The bomb is fired by means of a service cartridge carried in the extreme rear of the bomb, and is discharged by means of a striker which fires the cartridge on contact. The bullet of the cartridge ignites the thermit, which in turn ignites the solidified oil. The zinc shell is consumed and the oil forms an intense field of fire.

The scatter type, Mark I, is to be used against grain fields, camps, or buildings of flimsier construction, where it is desired to have a larger distribution of the incendiary material. The body is similar in construction to the intensive type, except that the afterbody is constructed of one-thirty-second inch sheet steel. The bomb is filled with balls of waste soaked in turpentine, with a charge of black powder carried in the nose, which is exploded in the same manner as the intensive type—that is, a service cartridge carried in the tail, which is exploded on contact. The explosion of the black-powder charge ruptures the afterbody of the bomb and ignites and scatters the incendiary material.

There is one more bomb that I have brought here, known as the 9.45 inch trench mortar shell.

This shell, with its propelling charge, is for use in the 9.45-inch trench mortar and is in every way interchangeable with the French ammunition used in the French 240-millimeter trench mortar. The shell itself is interchangeable with the shell the English use in their 240-millimeter trench mortar.

This shell, empty, weighs approximately 85 pounds. When loaded with high explosive and ready for firing, it weighs approximately 180 pounds.

Our Mark VII fuse, "delay type," is used in connection with this shell. This fuse is interchangeable with the French fuse, used for the same purpose. The interior mechanism, it is believed, however, to be more positive and considerably less expensive.

The 9.45-inch trench mortar has a maximum range of fair accuracy under good conditions up to 2,500 yards, but a slight instability of the base or moderate wind greatly affects its accuracy. For a gun of its size it is remarkably easy to transport and can be easily taken apart and put together. The mortar itself can be transported by hand, by mule back, or by the one-horse carts provided. The wooden platform and other matériel attached to the battery can be handled by motorized vehicle equipment.

It is used against the "pill boxes," those places that it is so absolutely necessary to destroy and yet so very difficult to destroy and which can not be destroyed by any of these lighter shells.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DENISON. Has the gentleman ever seen what is called the depth bomb that is used in the destruction of submarines? Can he explain that to the House?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I saw the drawings of one before it was ever made. I have not seen it, of course, in actual operation; but there is such a bomb made, not to fire when it reaches the water, but to go to any depth for which it is set, and then explode.

Mr. DENISON. It does not explode by contact, but by time?

Mr. TILSON. It explodes by depth; but there is a whirligig in the tail that starts to run when the shell reaches the water. As soon as that device reaches the number of times set it releases a pin that works a firing pin and fires the bomb.

Mr. DENISON. What is it that destroys the submarine if it is not contact? Is it the shock?

Mr. TILSON. The contact would destroy the submarine if it happened to hit it, but the concussion is very great. Water is a good conductor.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman state how much high explosives those depth bombs carry? I think that would be interesting to the gentlemen.

Mr. TILSON. I do not know how high they have carried them. They began at about 250 pounds.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would say that they run 300.

Mr. TILSON. Yes. I was sure they would go on up.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I was going to add a further word to that which the gentleman has said, on destruction by the depth bomb. I made some particular inquiry of our naval officers, and especially those operating destroyers, when I was in Europe, and from them all I received the information that a depth bomb is set to explode about 80 feet beneath the surface. It takes a point below the submarines—that is, it does not explode until it gets below the submarine. The query at once was, how close to a submarine must the bomb be when it explodes, in order to destroy the submarine? Opinion differs. It is agreed by all that if the explosion occurs within 50 feet of the submarine it will destroy it, and most of them are agreed that if it explodes within 100 feet of the submarine the submarine will be destroyed. The reason they set it to explode beneath the submarine is that the explosion moves along the line of least resistance, which is upward.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. TILSON. I have but a little time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I saw the diagram on your chart there, and I would like if you could tell how wide and deep the trenches are. Can you tell us a little of the character of the trenches?

Mr. TILSON. I have it outlined, so that the gentleman can see them a little later.

One other matter connected with the subject of munitions which might be called a belated correction of the Secretary of War. It is not intended as a criticism, for it has not been my method to criticize anyone in the course of my work in the field of munitions. I have sought for useful facts, and having found them have tried to give the House and the country the benefit of those facts.

No one realizes more clearly than I do the overwhelming magnitude of the task and the perplexing complexity of the problems devolved upon the Secretary of War. I would be the last one to unjustly attack or criticize him. I have helped to the best of my ability to hold up his hands on every matter for the better conduct of the war, and expect to continue to do so to the end of the chapter.

In the interest of accuracy, however, at a time when accuracy is more important than ever before, because so much more may depend upon it, I wish to call attention to two statements, both made in June, 1917. Under date of June 25, Secretary Baker, complying with a resolution passed by the Senate on June 15, wrote to the President of the Senate as follows:

> The French rifles and machine guns are not and have not been manufactured in this country; hence, through lack of manufacturing facilities, the question of the use of French ammunition for rifles and machine guns could not be considered.

On June 1, more than three weeks earlier, I had stood on the floor of the House and said—

> Since I came to the House this morning a gentleman from my State has put into my hands another rifle, which I hold in my hands. It is the French rifle. * * * It is called the Lebel rifle. This rifle is made in Bridgeport under contract with the French Government. I have been informed that they have about 10,000 now on hand and are prepared to make a great many more.

The two statements are before you. Take your choice. The French rifle made in Bridgeport I again hold in my hands, and here are the cartridges to fit it, made in the same city and exhibited by me to the House last June.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. My understanding was that the reason for changing the Enfield rifle to make it use Springfield ammunition, and the consequent delay caused by that, was that the ammunition in the Springfield rifle would also fit the machine gun. In other words, they wanted the same cartridge to be used interchangeably by the machine guns and the rifle.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; that is highly important.

Mr. BORLAND. It developed that the machine guns were not so numerous as they might have been, and the demand for rifles is very great. What does the gentleman think of the change in the ammunition for the rifle?

Mr. TILSON. If we had not made the change, we should now have three kinds of ammunition—United States for our Springfields, British for our Enfields, and French for our machine guns. Now we have only two—the United States and the French.

Mr. BORLAND. Could the machine guns that we are making be rechambered or fitted to the ammunition of the Enfield rifle? If we had gone ahead making the Enfield rifle on the original British pattern, could we have adapted our machine guns to that?

Mr. TILSON. The new guns made after that could have been made to fire the British ammunition. In fact, they were making them to fire the British ammunition at that time.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that at the time this change was considered the Lewis gun was using the same ammunition that would fit the Lee-Enfield gun.

Mr. TILSON. Yes. The Lewis gun was made to fit that ammunition from the beginning.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What is the name of that gun [indicating]?

Mr. TILSON. That is the Lebel, caliber .315, of the French. It is a very handsome gun. They use these cartridges, a copper bullet. The question is now being raised in this country whether it is not possible to manufacture these bullets out of brass, because we are great experts in manufacturing things out of brass in this country. If they can be used and fired from the machine guns and rifles, we can produce them out of brass in very great quantities. So far the French have chosen to use copper bullets.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit one more question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand it, it was the change in the chambering of the gun that caused the delay in the manufacture of the Enfield, as well as other details?

Mr. TILSON. Some time was required to make the change, although the time was comparatively short. It takes some time to change your dies and gauges. It is always a serious matter and takes time. You can hardly tell the difference from where you sit between these two rifles, but at the same time it is really an important change.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman realizes that there were other changes made besides the changes in the chambering in the new model of the Enfield?

Mr. TILSON. The new model of the Enfield is an entirely different gun from the old Lee-Enfield. I went into that subject fully in one of my speeches here, and showed that the new model of the Enfield is an entirely different gun from the old Lee-Enfield gun; a very different and, in my judgment, a much better gun. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, in this brief period of time I want again to call attention to the report of the Surgeon General of the United States as to the sanitary conditions at Army camps and to its history. In reply to the innuendoes of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], to the effect that this report was suppressed in some way by the officers of this House or by somebody else, I want to say that this report was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. WARREN GARD, on the 7th day of January, the present month. It was printed by unanimous consent. On the next day, by unanimous consent, at the request of the same gentleman, this report was made a House document. On the 8th day of January, when the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 7 made its appearance, there were available 33,000 copies of this report, of which approximately 50 had been placed to the credit of the gentleman from Nebraska, and I presume used by him in the libraries of his district. I do not know what he did with them. The 33,000 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 7 were issued on the morning of the 8th day of January, every one of them containing this report, going principally to the libraries of this country where everybody could see it.

Now, so much for that "suppression." On the 8th day of January this report was made a public document at the request of a Democratic Member of this House, and under the rules of this House 1,250 copies only could be printed of this House document, or approximately that number. It was available for printing, then, as a House document on the 9th day of January. No other printing office in the country is so congested at the present time as the Government Printing Office, but if any Member of this House had called up the Public Printer over the telephone and had asked him to make this document special, its printing and the placing of it in the document room could have been expedited. But that could only have affected the insignificant number of 1,250 copies.

As a matter of fact, on yesterday afternoon this document reached the document room of this House, and was available hours before the gentleman made his speech here this morning, 1,250 copies of it reaching the document room in eight days after it was possible for the Public Printer to find out that this order had been made. One Sunday intervened; this left seven working days in which to get out this document. I submit that that is remarkably fast time for any printing office in this country, even if not congested with work, to turn out 1,250 copies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. May I have two minutes more, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. My time is completely filled, but I will yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. RAINEY. I want to call attention to the fact that the statement has been made here repeatedly this morning that this fuel order issued by the Fuel Administrator affects plants operated by water power. It does not affect them in the least, and the Fuel Administrator, under the act passed by Congress, has no right to regulate or to suspend plants unless they are operated by coal. The charge has been made here repeatedly on the floor this morning and a manufacturer of prominence, who is a Member of this House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER], stated that fuel must be burned in enormous quantities for the purpose of keeping these plants warm, that otherwise they will be injured by the cold. The order provides for that emergency. I have it as it is printed here in the noon papers. The order provides that plants which necessarily must be operated continuously seven days each week to avoid serious injury to the plant itself or its contents may use only such quantity of fuel as is necessary to prevent such injury to the plant or its contents. Now, there can be but one construction placed upon that part of this order. It authorizes factories which heat their plants with waste steam to use enough coal to create enough waste steam to heat those factories. Of course, that means that, to the extent of the fuel actually consumed for the purpose of producing the necessary waste steam to prevent injury to factories, they can run their machinery. Nothing can be any plainer than that.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I am sorry I can not. These gentlemen, who, upon these important questions, are becoming such magnificent vehicles of misinformation, and who print this stuff in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, ought to find out what the facts are. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the people as a rule are loyal and want us to win this war, and yet the question uppermost in the minds of a great many of them is, "Why are we in this war?" I think it is a sufficient answer to say:

First. We are in this war because Germany made it impossible for us to stay out of it.

Second. Because we can not and will not permit any nation to scorn our sovereignty and insult our flag.

Third. Because as the leading democratic nation of the world we are too red blooded to stand idly by and see autocracy murder democracy.

Need I say more to justify our entrance into this war? If there is a human being who invokes the protection of the Stars and Stripes and yet who does not think that we are justified in spending every dollar and spilling every drop of blood, if necessary, in defending the rights of mankind to "Life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness," the highest principle of humanity, let him leave the country and no longer disgrace the Red, White, and Blue. [Applause.]

We have not entered this conflict because we love war more, but because we hate Prussian autocracy worse. Let me give you a sample of it.

The Kaiser, in addressing German recruits at Potsdam, said:

Only one is master in the Empire, and I am that one; I will tolerate no other.

I represent monarchy by the grace of God.

You must all have one will, and that is my will; there is only one law, and that is my law.

If I order you to shoot down your relatives, brothers—yes, even your parents—you must obey me without murmuring.

In his proclamation of September 13, 1914, the Kaiser declared:

The spirit of God has descended upon me because I am German Emperor.

I am the instrument of the Most High. I am His sword, His representative on earth.

Woe and death to those who oppose my will! Death to the infidel who denies my mission!

Let all the enemies of the German nation perish! God demands their destruction—God, who by my mouth summons you to carry out His decrees.

Do you want this madman, this blasphemer, to rule the world?

We temporized with Germany until forbearance ceased to be a virtue. Her record became one of broken promises and intolerable wrongs. To have submitted further to her terms, conditions, and conduct would have marked us as a Nation of craven cowards.

We are not in this war for material gain. We want no additional territory. We want to make no subject slaves. We subscribe fully to the sentiment, "Since Christ died to make men holy, we will die to make men free." We want only to crush the arrogant, impudent, and dangerous Prussian autocracy and establish throughout the world the right of mankind to rule themselves. Are not our ideals lofty and our purposes righteous?

What does this war then mean to us? It means that if we will adhere to our lofty purposes, do our part, and "come clean," God will bless our efforts and give us a glorious victory. But first of all we have got to "come clean." I mean by that that all selfishness, such as profiteering, taking advantage of the situation to make money, regardless of the misery and distress that such conduct may bring upon others, must be eliminated. Every one of us must be willing to make the necessary sacrifices. Our soldier boys are willing to make the supreme sacrifice. No man can do more than to lay his life down for another; they are willing to do this if necessary. Now, what are we willing to do? May I not assume that the American people are willing to make any necessary sacrifice to win this war? I am sure that the only thing that most of us need to know is, What is required of us in this great emergency? I regret, however, that there are those—only a few in comparison, I hope—who are mean enough and selfish enough to try to take advantage of the situation and fill their pockets with gold. They have not yet learned the lesson of patriotism without profit. They are nothing less than enemies to their country and deserve the condemnation of every right-thinking, true, loyal citizen, and if that is not sufficient to force them to desist in their nefarious practices, then they should be made to feel the strong arm of the law.

I hope that conditions may not arise whereby our people may not, as in peace times, receive a just compensation for their efforts and energy, yet we must be ready for any sacrifice. Under ordinary conditions everyone is entitled to a just price for whatever he earns or has to sell, but it is nothing less than criminal for a person or a combination of persons to take advantage of the situation and fill their pockets with money stained with the blood of our patriotic American boys. I repeat that if we are to win this war we must all "come clean" and get right down to bedrock and make sacrifices—the rich and the poor alike.

Wars have always been expensive in treasure as well as blood, but the cost of this war is so stupendous that it staggers the imagination. We can speak of its material cost only in terms of billions. Under these conditions, that nation is wisest and strongest that husbands best its resources. This is the first time in the history of our Nation when we have really been put to a test as to our material resources. We have rolled in plenty and never had occasion to think that the time would ever come when we would need to economize. We are there now, and it behooves every one of us to practice the most rigid self-denial.

No one realizes more than I do the stupendous task of transforming our Nation from that of a peace-loving and peace-going Nation to one of war. Everybody understands that this is a feat that can not be performed overnight. When it became necessary for us to undertake this task it did not look possible that it could be done within any reasonable time, but it has only been a few months since war was declared and now, when we look back on the record of what has been accomplished within so short a period, we are made to marvel at our own progress. With practically no Army when war was declared, we now have more than a million men under arms and in training. These men are being equipped as rapidly as conditions seem to permit. Congress has not withheld the money necessary to care for and equip these splendid, patriotic soldiers, and the executive branches of the Government have proceeded as rapidly to carry out the will of the President and Congress in this regard as circumstances and red tape would permit. Mistakes have been made, you say? Yes; and more will be made. This gigantic task could not be put through by ordinary human beings without some errors creeping in, but as fast as those errors are discovered an attempt will be made and is now being made to correct them. The one thing now most needful is to eliminate all red tape and all petty jealousies. Upon the whole, I think we must admit that considering conditions that the record so far made is one which our people may feel proud. [Applause.]

I confess that there is room for critfcism, and proper criticism is valuable, provided, of course, it carries with it some suggestions of improvement in methods employed, but criticism for criticism's sake only is harmful and exceedingly dangerous and may be criminal in that it may have a tendency to delay the ending of this war and therefore mean the sacrificing of additional lives at the front.

I am convinced that the people of this Nation have unbounded confidence in our President and I believe that this confidence is fully justified, yet President Wilson can not win this war unless the people as one man get behind him and subordinate all selfish desire for gain or pleasure and make the winning of this war the one and only object until the glorious victory has been achieved. [Applause.]

I have said that we entered this war with a righteous and pure motive and we must and will prevail, provided we "come clean," but we can not win it if while 10 per cent of our population are fighting in the trenches the other 90 per cent are at home trying, each one, to exploit the other. We can not win this war if we permit those who control the vital necessities of life to put up prices to a point which will bring want, misery, distress, and starvation upon those who are left at home. We may as well face this question like men, and the sooner we do it the better. Let me cite some homely instances. We have recently passed the Christmastide—a time in each year when all the generosity that is in our natures is aroused and when all hearts are most tender, but I am told that right here in the Capitol City of our Nation and in sight of the Federal Food Administration headquarters profiteering has been running riot. For example: Christmas eve night, I am told, the markets and many retail grocery stores at closing time were loaded with dressed turkeys which they would not sell to the people for less than 42 cents per pound and chickens 35 cents per pound, and other things in proportion, evidently preferring to let them rot rather than set the precedent of reducing the price which perhaps and likely was agreed upon in advance by the dealers. Meal, made out of $1.40 corn, I am told, will cost you $2.40 per bushel. There is practically no waste in grinding corn, and everyone knows that it does not cost a dollar to grind a bushel of corn. Who makes this unreasonable profit? Take the item of coal; which is a very vital necessity. I see the almost unbelievable statement in the press that bituminous coal that sells at the mines for about $1.90 a ton costs the consumer here $9 a ton. Who gets that difference of $7 on the ton? Who is responsible for the unreasonable increase of cost to the consumer?

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. BLAND. Has the gentleman considered the cost of the production of shoes in connection with this investigation?

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not shoes specially.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest that the average cost of the materials in a pair of shoes does not exceed $2.60, and the labor in the same does not exceed $3 more, and yet shoes are selling for $10, $11, and $12 a pair to-day.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am sure the gentleman is correct, because I know absolutely that the price of a certain shoe with which I am familiar has doubled within the last two years, but I have not investigated the increase in the cost of the material used.

The demoralized condition of the transportation facilities which has heretofore existed may have contributed somewhat to this condition, but I am persuaded that it will not entirely account for the wide margin in the difference between the price to the producer and the price to the consumer. I think that I see evidence of profiteering. I could go on almost ad infinitum, but I think it sufficient to say that other necessities of life have doubled and in some cases trebled and quadrupled; in fact, many of them have reached a prohibitive price.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. SNYDER. A moment ago the gentleman said "the demoralized condition heretofore existing on the railroads." By that does he mean to convey the idea that there is no confusion existing now in railroad management?

Mr. HAMLIN. No; I do not mean to convey that idea, but I do mean to state the fact that under private management the whole transportation system seemed to have broken down, and the Government was forced to take over the railroads of the country in the hope, in which I join, that transportation facilities will be improved, and I am inclined to think they will.

Mr. SNYDER. I quite agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will, for a question.

Mr. BLAND. Last August facts were presented to this House showing that instead of increasing our number of freight cars they were decreasing, and a bill was introduced here for the Government to speed up the building of freight cars in the nine factories that were only running 50 per cent of their time. But instead of doing that, Dr. Garfield regulated the price of coal, decreasing the output and not increasing the number of coal cars. Could there be anything else expected except a coal famine and a coal shortage at this time?

Mr. HAMLIN. I would be glad to discuss the transportation question if I had the time. I have some thoughts on that subject myself, and I think we never have gotten to the bottom of that proposition; but my time will not permit me to discuss it now.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman know of any reason why there should not be men of ability called into the Cabinet of the President, men who are Republicans or of some other politics than Democrats?

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the President's Cabinet is now composed of men of ability. [Applause.] I am also prepared to say to the gentleman that many of the men who are responsible for some of the very things he is now complaining about are Republicans. [Applause.] If I understand it, Dr. Garfield, against whom severe criticism has been leveled here to-day, is not a Democrat.

Mr. BLAND. He is a college professor, is he not?

Mr. HAMLIN. I presume he is guilty of being a college professor, but I think that is no crime.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman know of any reason——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I yield for one more question.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman know any reason why President Wilson should not call into his Cabinet men of the opposite political faith, as Lincoln did when he called four Democrats into his Cabinet?

Mr. HAMLIN. President Wilson has been able to manage the affairs of this Government in the most magnificent manner, according to the opinion of the late Republican candidate for the Presidency, Mr. Hughes, and in which opinion I heartily coincide, and I do not think he needs any suggestion from me as to the management of his Cabinet affairs. [Applause.] Now, since you have mentioned that, I want to say to the gentleman something more. I have thought until this morning that I saw no evidence of politics entering into the conduct of this war, so far as Congress was concerned. I had thought I had seen no evidence of lack of patriotism on the part of anyone here; but this morning I could not resist the conclusion that politics is being dragged into this discussion.

Mr. BLAND. On which side?

Mr. HAMLIN. On the Republican side, of course. Nobody knows that better than the gentleman; and he must know something else: That whenever this administration or any other administration, for that matter, does anything that will tend to lessen the profits of certain people making money out of this war they begin to howl, and, unfortunately, they find voice on the floor of this House. I was surprised at my friend from New York, Mr. SNYDER, a while ago, virtually pleading guilty for the bankers of his district when he said they had worked loyally, patriotically, and enthusiastically in the sale of liberty bonds in the aid of the prosecution of this war, but when they found out that they would be charged a tax of 2 cents on a hundred dollars on all renewal notes their patriotism vanished like the morning mist before the rising sun.

Mr. SNYDER. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I made no such statement as that.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman did not phrase it in just that language, but that was the tenor and substance of what he said. I am glad that we do not have any 2-cent patriots out in my country.

Now, I shall return to the particular matter that I was discussing.

I grant you there is some excuse for increase in the prices. Inflation of the currency, scarcity of labor, congestion in traffic all contribute to an increase of the price to the ultimate consumer, but the whole level of prices are entirely too high. Just what can be done to lower them is a difficult question to solve, but of this I am sure, that the cost of the necessities of life must be reduced or many people must suffer.

Mr. Chairman, I grant you that the people themselves are not wholly without blame in this connection. The necessity for economizing and practicing the Golden Rule has not yet been sufficiently impressed upon them. I noticed in the papers a few days ago that the merchants of this city gleefully gave out the statement that they had enjoyed the greatest Christmas trade in the history of the city. What occurred here no doubt occurred in all the other cities of the country. That means that millions and millions of dollars were spent within the last few weeks for toys, candies, and things that could well have been left unpurchased, and the money thus foolishly used could have been invested in thrift stamps, war-savings stamps, liberty bonds, Red Cross work, and so forth, all of which would tend to help win this war, the winning of which would be the greatest Christmas present that could be given to mankind.

Mr. Chairman, there is one thing that I do not want to live to see, and that is the shadow of the Kaiser cast athwart our fair land, nor the specter of misery, distress, and want stalking through our beloved country. Yet both of these are possibilities unless each one of us will cast aside all selfishness and dedicate ourselves to the one and only task of winning this war at whatever sacrifice required. In this, of course, politics do not enter. Democrats and Republicans work side by side. We are all patriots. Again I say that if we are to win this war we must "come clean." Every mother whose boy has gone to the front is constantly, fervently praying that God will keep him pure and clean and bring him back to her safely, without a blemish upon his character and with the consciousness of duty faithfully performed. Can we as a Nation "come clean" if we permit intoxicating liquors to be "doped" out to these boys? I answer, "No; a thousand times, no!" and I believe that if we attempt to do it that there will be visited upon us, as a Nation, a punishment that will be appalling. In times of war, above all other times, liquor should be eliminated. It not only demoralizes our soldiers but to make the vile stuff robs others of bread.

We read of atrocities committed by our enemies, atrocities that makes the American Indian in his most savage days look like an angel of light in comparison. Whether the picture has been overdrawn, I do not know; I hope that it has; but in any event, I trust that our flag, which not only stands for liberty but for Christianity as well, will not be sullied by our soldiers practicing cruel, inhuman, or barbarous warfare. There is such a thing as war being tempered with mercy. I have an abiding faith that if we as a people will "come clean" and fight the war as a civilized and Christian people, God will give us a speedy and glorious victory. Right must and will prevail.

When Cyrus, King of Persia, was induced to permit a portion of the captive Jews to return to Jerusalem and rebuild the temple which had been destroyed, a decree went forth to those Jews who remained in Babylonia requiring them to contribute of their gold, silver, and goods in aid of those engaged in the rebuilding of the temple.

Our brave boys are going to Europe to build there a temple of liberty and freedom of mankind—dedicated to world democracy. Shall we who remain at home hesitate for a moment to contribute of our gold, silver, and goods in the prosecution of this great and glorious enterprise? [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am greatly surprised if not shocked at the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] that politics have crept into the war discussion in this House through the Republican side, and I feel that that statement ought not to go without challenge. Because upon the Republican side it has been observed for a long time that though commissions have been created and new officers authorized to conduct this war, in all of which Republicans have readily joined with Democrats, there have been no appointments from the White House or by departments except from the Democratic Party, and that this war except as it is promoted and being paid for in a by-partisan sense is being conducted in a partisan sense, which is very much to be regretted and of which the country is gradually taking notice.

The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] suggests that the Fuel Administrator, who has come into more or less notoriety during the last day or two by reason of his drastic order closing up the industries of the country, is a Republican. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will yield, I did not say he was a Republican; I said that he was not a Democrat.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; the gentleman from Missouri did equivocate in that manner.

Mr. HAMLIN. There was no equivocation about it, it is a fact.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman camouflaged. The Fuel Administrator has been an enthusiastic Wilson Democrat for a long time, and when it was suggested that there should be a Republican House to cooperate with the Democratic administration in the White House Dr. Garfield, over his own signature, denounced that suggestion and came out openly for Mr. Wilson.

I challenge the gentleman from Missouri, or any other gentleman upon the other side, to point to any Republicans that have been appointed by the President of the United States to any of the so-called nonpartisan commissions that have been authorized by Republicans as well as Democrats.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. There are two great positions in my mind—very important at the present time—the Federal Food Administrator and the Federal Fuel Administrator. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will not state to the House that either Mr. Hoover or Dr. Garfield is a Democrat. They may have voted for Mr. Wilson as thousands of other good sensible Republicans did. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; and they probably did it upon the pretense put forth by the other side and widely advertised and heralded throughout the country that Mr. Wilson would "keep us out of war." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In connection with what the gentleman has just stated I want to say that there have been persons appointed that claim to be Republicans. I would like to know whether any Republican has been appointed that was known to have voted against Mr. Wilson.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Wherever the appointing power was able to find some one who had a remote connection with the Republican Party and who had left it for some cause or other, possibly to aid in its disruption, he seems to have selected that man to put on these commissions in the name of the Republican Party.

It was and has been a case of camouflage from the beginning to the end. Why, the advice of men like Roosevelt and Taft and Hughes has been disregarded by this administration down to the present time, and yet in the hour of our direst necessity, with these men willing to cooperate and the Republican side of the House voting for money, and with all good patriotic men willing to do their part to aid the administration in furthering the welfare of the country in promoting the war, we have it even from members of the Cabinet that only Democrats are to be appointed.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman submit to another interruption?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FESS. When the Federal reserve act was before the House we offered an amendment to make it bipartisan or nonpartisan, and the chairman of the committee denounced any suggestion, because, he said, it would suggest that there might be a partisan appointment; and it was defeated, and then the gentleman will remember there was a board made up with every single member of the committee a Democrat. Mr. Jones had been appointed, but was refused confirmation in the Senate by Democrats because of good reasons, and then he came back and was appointed on another commission.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; it was said that Mr. Jones had contributed largely to the campaign of the Democratic Party, and after he was rejected for a place on the Federal Reserve Board he did come back and received an appointment on another commission.

Mr. FESS. Yes; that is true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Showing the persistence with which a Democratic administration takes care of its own.

Mr. FESS. The same thing was done with Mr. Rublee, of New Hampshire.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. The gentleman has an admirable way of stating facts. To show how disinterested in politics our friends on the other side are and how they resent the notion that a man may be patriotic and still resist the encroachments of the Democratic Party upon an unwilling Nation, I read from an article from the Philadelphia Evening Ledger of yesterday, headed "Congressman Casey made aid of Wilson." That refers to Mr. Wilson, the Secretary of Labor.

The dispatch is from the staff correspondent in the city of Washington, and is dated January 16, 1918. It says:

Former Congressman John J. Casey, of Wilkes-Barre, has been appointed a member of the advisory committee named by Secretary of Labor William B. Wilson. Casey is a personal as well as political friend of the Labor Secretary, and the move is considered significant as part of the campaign of the present national administration to cut into Pennsylvania's Republican delegation in Congress.

Of course, there is no intent in making these appointments to fix up fences for ex-Members who desire to come back. [Laughter.] They spurn the notion that in time of crisis, when the Nation's honor and safety are at stake, they should do anything by way of appointments that would strengthen the hands of the Democrats. Of course. It is stated in the article that Mr. Casey is the personal and "political" friend of Secretary Wilson, and receives this appointment on that account. The article continues:

During his term in the House, Casey was considered a leader of the organized-labor forces—

Democrats must do everything they can now to cement labor to the Democratic Party, and Casey is coming back to do that. Secretary Wilson, of the nonpartisan Department of Labor, would not think of appointing anybody but a good Democrat as his aide.

During his term in the House Casey was considered a leader of the organized labor forces, and was prominent in the fight for passage of the trainmen's eight-hour law at the close of the last Congress.

Oh, the President never camouflaged the railroad men on the eight-hour law, did he? It was Casey at the bat! It is Casey who gets the appointment now under a nonpartisan, patriotic Secretary of Labor, who desires to see the forces of Democracy reenforced and strengthened in this House.

Every effort is being made to strengthen the party ranks in Pennsylvania where there is an opportunity to gain a Congressman. The Luzerne County district is one which may be won by either the Republican or Democratic Parties.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman seems to overlook the fact that the President has appointed a great many Republicans at a dollar a year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; they have been rendering patriotic service at that price, and they will be exempt from the income tax to the extent of the interest on that dollar. But I disdain to discuss politics! [Laughter.] I was provoked into making these few references only because of the high esteem in which I hold my nonpolitical friend from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

What I do desire to speak about, briefly, is the question of transportation. It is heralded on the signs in the street cars and elsewhere, largely through the auspices of Mr. Hoover and the funds we have appropriated, that "food will win the war." Very many individuals have indicated that the particular commodities they manufacture will win the war; others, that munitions will win the war; but my humble judgment is that transportation will win this war, and that efficient transportation only will win this war. We are mighty deficient in transportation. We have the men, we have the money, we have all the resources except efficient and sufficient transportation; and now, when the administration has done what seems to be its best to promote the war, it is brought face to face with the fact long neglected, long ignored, long deliberately set aside, that we have been deficient in transportation.

I am the son of a farmer and was raised in the country and had an opportunity to watch the habits of the squirrel. I have never forgotten that the one peculiar trait of the squirrel is not merely to hunt nuts but to provide against the coming of the winter. Gentlemen who go about the public squares of Washington may observe the squirrel when the summer is on, when the fall has come, when the autumnal leaves are falling, going about his business assiduously, gathering his nuts, his fruit, and other resources and putting them away against the time when the snow comes and bars the entrance to his home. A splendid lesson for the human animal, a splendid lesson for the Nation that ought to be prepared against the storm, whether it be the stress of winter or the stress of war. Now, some of us, like the squirrel, perhaps, have been preaching the doctrine of preparedness not only against adversity in time of peace but the storm of war. We have been urging better transportation facilities for just such an emergency as has arisen.

What does this recent Garfield order mean? If I interpret it correctly, drastic as it is, harsh as it will be upon the industries of the great State that I, in part, represent, difficult as it will be for the laboring man and the plain people to exist under it, it means that because we have not adequately provided transportation facilities by means that were within our power and which we ignored, we are forced to close down our industries until transportation catches up.

Look at this map of the United States—we are now cramming all our country produces—foodstuffs, war materials, coal, and the like into this neck of the woods here at the city of New York until we actually block the way. This is the exit for the goods that you are sending to Europe. You are crowding the rails and using the cars for storage. Here is the exit for the troops whom you have been looking after with such care and earnestness—all of them, men, cars, commodities, munitions, jamming themselves up against this one port of New York. Is it any wonder there is congestion?

You have your great trunk lines of railroads extending across this vast domain of ours; you have them running at full tilt with foodstuffs from the South and from those wonderful, productive areas in the Middle West; you have them coming, one train after the other, supplying the great industrial establishments of the East, but if times are abnormal and you want to get across the ocean to meet the enemy upon the other side you are bound to run up against just such a condition as Mr. Garfield is now trying to meet. You must proceed through the neck of the bottle at the city of New York. Coming down here from the New England States the jam continues; commerce packs in at New York like the ice that comes down from the Great Lakes and gorges Niagara. That is the situation with reference to the transportation of the country at the present time.

I have been arguing for a long while, even as my friend [Mr. TILSON] said he has been arguing for preparedness in the matter of armament, for the preparation of this country for commercial purposes, as well as for war purposes, by adding our waterways and canals to our transportation system. Here are serviceable avenues of approach and communication that have been standing idle at our doors. Like the squirrel, I believe in preparing for the winter. These waterways and canals are workable all summer, but, unfortunately, when the crash comes, when the first real war blow is about to be struck, we find the products of 48 States of the Union unable to use them, packed in one solid mass at the port of New York, waiting for the railroads to unload. Are we shipping war materials from the port of Jacksonville? That might relieve congestion at New York. Are the railroads carrying stuff from the West and South to Jacksonville, so that it may go out across the great sea? Are we sending war materials from Savannah? Savannah has deep water and a good harbor. Are we sending them in ample quantities from Baltimore? Are we sending them to the extent of our capacity from Philadelphia, that great industrial center now so helpful in the war? And are we utilizing our forces to the full at the port of Boston? If our waterways were properly encouraged they might now be serving the country at all these ports.

Why is it that Mr. Garfield, right or wrong, has to issue an order that stagnates the business and industries of the country? To a large degree it is because we have never prepared our transportation facilities by water; because we have permitted to go by the opportunity in the season when the squirrel works to do work for ourselves and store up for the winter. Had we had these waterways opened at the trifling cost that has frequently been referred to here, would we have a coal shortage to-day? Had we taken this antiquated Chesapeake & Ohio Canal, which runs hither to Cumberland, a distance of 187 miles, freed it from some infernal domination that held it in check and wished it ill, and used it in July, in August, in September, in October to bring coal to Washington, and in turn to Norfolk and Baltimore, would we have had a coal shortage here in Washington or in this vicinity?

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that the congestion at New York Harbor and the other harbors of the Atlantic seaboard is due to the lack of ocean shipping?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No, sir; not altogether. It is due largely to the fact that you can not get your cars up there to be unloaded. Boats are lying idle in the Delaware River at the present time laden with coal. They should be in New England feeding the mills and firing with at least some degree of comfort the homes of the people now in want of coal. Yet the Government has taken away the propelling power. The Government itself has taken away the ocean-going barges capable of towing coal where it is needed. I have evidence here——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman any information as to what is being done with those steam tugboats that were formerly used in towing coal?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Lying idle at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, and the barges now lying idle in the ice a little farther up in the river. When I observed them before the ice came, they were ready and waiting to carry it to the people who needed coal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield the gentleman one minute more in order to enable him to answer this question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Who is responsible for the tugs lying idle in the Philadelphia Navy Yard?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have stated that the barges were laden with coal in the Delaware River when there was no ice in the river and could have gone to Boston and Providence and returned ten times over with more coal before the ice came.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I mean the tugs.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The propelling tugs were commandeered by the Government, and they now rest in easy berths at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, unless some change has recently occurred.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And they are not being used for any purpose?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They may be used for something, but not very much now. The Government, I presume, is holding them in readiness for war purposes. And yet menhaden fishing boats, with ample power to do Government work, were going out to sea, catching and grinding up food fish to obtain oil and profit in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, in order that I may put some material in the RECORD, to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, in order to add to the variety of topics discussed under this general debate I shall address a few remarks to the subject of workmen's compensation for the benefit of interstate railway employees. At this time it comes under the head of a war proposition.

Section 9 of the so-called administration railway bill introduced by the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee in the House on January 4, 1918, proposes to give the President authority to extend the Federal workmen's compensation act of September, 1916, so as to apply to the employees of the railways.

With the objects to be secured by the act I am in full sympathy, but to the methods proposed to accomplish such purposes I am opposed.

On the 21st day of January last in the course of my remarks on the floor of this Chamber I called attention to the dereliction of Congress in its failure to enact a workmen's compensation law which would cover the employees of the interstate carriers of the Nation. I at that time pointed out that in the Sixty-second Congress the Senate by a vote of 60 to 15 passed a bill and the House by a vote of 218 for to 81 against passed an amended workmen's compensation bill affecting the employees I have just referred to. But owing to the threat of a filibuster in the closing hours of that Congress its final passage was effectually blocked.

But the vote upon this bill disclosed an overwhelming sentiment in favor of such legislation. The Democratic national platform of 1912 carried a plank favoring such a law, and the Republican national platform of 1916 declared in favor of "a generous and comprehensive workmen's compensation law within the commerce power of Congress." Yet regardless of the overwhelming sentiment of the Sixty-second Congress and the clear, unequivocal expressions of the national platforms of the two great political parties of the country and the support given to the proposition in the Sixty-second Congress by Mr. H. E. Wills, the legislative agent of the railway brotherhoods, and all the heads of these brotherhoods as well as the head of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Samuel Gompers, and also their representative who appeared before the commission and the Senate committee, now the Senator from the State of Minnesota, FRANK B. KELLOGG, the proposition has lain dormant practically since the close of the Sixty-second Congress until this hour.

Ex-Senator Sutherland, the chairman of the Taft joint commission which made a full and exhaustive report upon this subject, upon which were based the principles of the bill voted on by the Sixty-second Congress, introduced a similar bill in the Senate of the Sixty-third Congress. This bill was the result of many years of hard work and intelligent attention devoted to the subject by Senator Sutherland and others who had become interested in workmen's compensation legislation. With some few changes and modifications I introduced in the House of Representatives on the first day of this Congress practically the same bill, being House bill No. 46. This bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House, but no action has been taken thereon. I commend its consideration to the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee as well as to all the Members of this Congress.

My bill proposes to apply to the interstate railways, requiring them to pay compensation to their injured employees and the widows and dependents of deceased employees meeting death as the result of accident in the course of employment. This bill enacted into law would make the expense due to its administration a part of the operating expense of the railway. Each railway or railway system would be charged with this expense the same as it is charged with the expenditures for the employment of labor and other costs incurred in the operation of the road. The substitution of the principles and administrative features of my bill for section 9 of the administration railway bill would not only provide a fair, uniform compensation for injured employees and the dependents of deceased employees during the continuance of the war, but the law and its benefits could be continued in full force and attached to the railways following the war, should the railways be turned back to the control of private interests, by the adoption of a simple congressional resolution.

While the adoption of a scheme extending the present Federal workmen's compensation law would directly charge the Government with the payment of compensation which would continue as a charge in the nature of pensions against the Government for long years following the war and the release of the railways from Government control, some new method providing compensation would have to be enacted into law at the time of the release of the railways by the Government, provided that railway employees of the future are to be paid such compensation.

The administrative features of my bill would place beyond political control, so far as it is possible to do so by legislation, the administration of the law. It provides for the appointment of adjusters, whose duties are prescribed by law, throughout the various States of the Union by the Federal district judges, subject to the approval of the United States Court of Appeals, and in such numbers as may be required to carry out the beneficent provisions of the act. These adjusters would occupy a position in relation to the law similar to that occupied by the referees under the bankruptcy act. They hold office for a term of four years, but may be removed at any time by the court or by the President, on the recommendation of the Attorney General of the United States, if his services are no longer required in the public interest or for good cause shown. The claimant for compensation is given the right to have his claim reviewed similar to the procedure under the bankruptcy act.

The extension of the provisions of the Federal compensation law would create a vast amount of additional work for the existing Federal Compensation Commission, which now consists of three members, located at the Capital, and necessarily require the appointment by the commission of a large number of adjusters throughout the country to dispose of claims, as more than 100,000 railway employees are annually injured, and as a result of such injuries more than 5,000 annually die.

Regardless of the theory that the commission is of a nonpartisan character, consisting of two Democrats and one Republican and possibly covered under the civil service, still its appointees will be absolutely partisan and come from the ranks of the party represented by the majority of the members composing the commission. Claims of this character arising between private individuals have usually been disposed of by the courts of the land, and I believe that it will be better in the future for the employees of the railways as well as the owners and the interests of the public be better conserved that this method continue.

The Federal compensation act was initiated and designed to affect Federal employees only, where private interests were in no wise concerned. Its proposed extension would affect the relationship between employees and private employers and would be a radical departure from the original theory and the objects to be accomplished by the existing law.

Of the pressing necessity for a workmen's compensation law covering the employees of interstate railways there can be no question. Laws of this character have been enacted by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States of the Union. While the constitutionality of such acts was a mooted question and the bone of great contention at the time of the filing of the report of the Taft Joint Commission, this trouble has been entirely eliminated by recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court upholding the constitutionality of the New York compensation statute in the case of the New York Central Railway against White, the case of Hawkins against Bleakley, under the Iowa statute, and the compensation law of the State of Washington in the case of Mountain Timber Co. against Washington, decided March 6, 1917. The Supreme Court clearly and unequivocally hold that the legislature of a State, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, has full power and authority to substitute a system of compensation for injuries received in private employment or damages by reason of death based upon the sole fact that such injuries or death have occurred in the course of employment, for the common law and statutory methods of redress based upon the fault of the employer.

But the United States Supreme Court hold in the cases of the New York Central Railway Co. against Winfield and the Erie Railway Co. against Winfield, decided May 21, 1917, that State workmen's compensation laws do not apply to interstate railways, for the reason that that field is already covered by the Federal employers' liability act theretofore passed by Congress. The Supreme Court hold that Congress, having legislated under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, providing that in cases of injury or death as a result of fault or negligence the fellow-servant rule and the assumption-of-risk rule were no longer available, and having modified the old contributory-negligence defense rule, so far as interstate railways were concerned it had provided a method for obtaining redress by the injured party and that such method was a sole one and absolute in its scope and excluded all other methods of procedure or of obtaining redress based on fault or any other ground that may be hereafter proposed.

In the case of New York Central Ry. Co. v. Winfield, supra (244 Sup. Ct. Rep., 147), the court states:

> It is settled that under the commerce clause of the Constitution Congress may regulate the obligation of common carriers and the rights of their employees arising out of injuries sustained by the latter where both are engaged in interstate commerce; and it is also settled that when Congress acts upon the subject all State laws covering the same field are necessarily superseded by reason of the supremacy of the national authority.

And later on in the opinion the court further states:

> Whether and in what circumstances railroad companies engaging in interstate commerce shall be required to compensate their employees in such commerce for injuries sustained therein are matters in which the Nation as a whole is interested, and there are weighty considerations why the controlling law should be uniform and not change at every State line.

The Supreme Court holds that Congress has full authority under the commerce clause of the Constitution to change or modify existing methods of obtaining redress on the part of employees of interstate carriers where such employees are engaged in interstate commerce, or to substitute for the existing method another method based upon the sole fact that injury has occurred in the course of employment as well as upon the fault of the employer.

The proponent of the so-called administration bill is undoubtedly impressed with the absolute necessity of legislation national in its character providing just and uniform rates of compensation throughout the entire country for the employees of interstate railways. The Supreme Court holds that there should be uniformity in the method of redress, and it is now clear that State workmen's compensation laws can not affect such employees or extend to them the benefits of State provisions. No two of the existing State compensation laws are alike. See page 56 of No. 203, Labor Bulletin.

So that if it is the universal opinion or the judgment of the majority of Congress that compensation should be paid for injury and death resulting in the course of employment by railways, regardless of the question of fault on the employer, and that such a system should supersede the existing method provided by the Federal employers' liability act, there should be no hesitancy in immediate action. State laws of more than three-fourths of the States have substituted the compensation principle for that based on fault and take care of the employees of intrastate railways and employees not engaged in interstate commerce.

Certainly then, if this new and humane principle is to obtain for the benefit of railway employees not engaged in interstate commerce, who will contend that the same broad and humane provision should not be placed in reach of those employees engaged in interstate commerce? This can be obtained by no other way than by an act of Congress. It is up to Congress to either repeal the Federal employers' liability acts and all statutory changes and modifications of the common-law method of obtaining redress for personal injury, and leave the whole field within the domain of the several States, with their varied and conflicting methods, decisions, and results, or by a Federal act substitute a uniform workmen's compensation method for the existing statutory method.

The administration is asking a change. Congress in the past has gone on record as strongly favoring a change of the method of redress on account of injury or death in interstate railway service, and it seems to be the universal judgment among the progressive States of the Union that the old antiquated method should give way to the compensation system. I therefore assume that Congress will at this session enact legislation providing a method of workmen's compensation on account of injury or death for the employees I have referred to.

The existing method for obtaining redress for injury or death on the part of a railway employee engaged in interstate commerce, or his dependents, has proved to be absolutely inadequate. The report of the Taft Joint Commission discloses that not one-half of the 100,000 employees annually injured receive any compensation under the existing method, and that not over 35 per cent of the amount paid out by the railway companies on account of injury or death of their employees ever reaches the pockets of their employees or their dependents. The substitution of the workmen's compensation system would give to all sustaining injuries or loss on account of death certain and fair compensation, unless it is shown that the injury or death was caused by the willful act of the employee or his intoxication.

So likely the only contention that will arise of any importance will be as to the method of administration, and it seems to me that the method of administration to be adopted for meting out compensation to the injured employee should be one that could easily be continued and carried on in the event the railways are released from Government control.

This is a matter of great importance, broad in its scope, and affecting nearly 2,000,000 employees of private employers, whose property under the war clause of the Constitution has been taken over by the President as a war necessity, and we must keep in mind that these railways are the property of private interests and will likely still be managed and operated by the directors, officials, and agents of the existing railway corporations, subject to the general supervision and orders of the Commander in Chief of our armies.

It therefore seems to me that a method of workmen's compensation should be adopted which would apply to the railways, and that could be easily and readily administered under the supervision of the courts of the Nation in times of peace as in time of war. An administrative machinery at all times workable, regardless of the country's condition, and under the jurisdiction and control of those tribunals created and resorted to for obtaining justice by the English-speaking people from time immemorial.

My bill provides for the establishment by law of judicial tribunals easily accessible to employees as well as employers; and in the event of the employee or employer being dissatisfied with the report of the adjuster, he may, on motion in writing, have the same removed from the United States district court to any State court of competent jurisdiction in the county where the cause of action arose or where the employee resides or is doing business at the time of such removal, and providing that if the employer removes said cause such removal shall be to the county where the cause of action arose or where the employee resides.

A right of review is given and a method of transfer of jurisdiction is provided where either party is dissatisfied with the decision of the adjuster, and such right of review and transfer of jurisdiction is to competent and well-tried-out tribunals and not left to the whim and caprice of some Federal compensation board, which could either deny a right of review of the adjuster by it appointed or could constitute itself the sole court of appeal from the adjuster's decision.

The existing Federal workmen's compensation law provides no machinery for the establishment of a judicial tribunal for the review of claims adjudicated by the board and no review of decision or transfer of jurisdiction can be had. Claims are adjudicated similar to the method employed by the Pension Bureau in the disposition of claims for pension. No interest is involved except that of the Government, the employee, and the public, while in the administration and disposition of claims of railway employees, in addition to the interests of the employee, the public and the Government involved, there should be considered the rights of the railway owners.

I will close by again expressing the hope that either my bill may become a law at this session of Congress or that its principles and administrative features may be substituted for section 9 of the administration railway bill, now being considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, a few afternoons ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] addressed the House on the subject of the Russian attempts at peace, and thought to establish a companionship or relationship between the demands of the present Russian Government and the terms as proposed by the President of the United States in his recent address before Congress. In my judgment, the record as it stands after the conclusion of his remarks requires some further word in order that as a people and as representatives of the people we may see the true facts and face them squarely.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], in a very able address at the time, replied to the gentleman from New York, but confined his reply to a discussion of the capacity of socialism to remedy existing evils. I desire to address myself to another phase of the subject, the one which to me is fundamental and the one to which we should direct our thought exclusively.

The great war in which we are engaged can never be fought so as to be won by theoretical considerations. It can only be fought and won by guns and powder and men in the right place at the right time. A brief thought as to the inception of this struggle may be of interest as we view the Russian situation to-day. We know that Austria served an ultimatum upon Serbia, no doubt inspired to do so by the Empire of Germany. Russia promptly mobilized her army to defend and help her sister country, Serbia.

The German Kaiser issued an ultimatum to the Czar of Russia stating that unless Russia demobilized immediately war would follow. The Russian Czar, apparently with a marvelous display of courage and strength, said that he pledged the last soldier and the last kopeck of the Russian Empire to the cause for which the Slavic race had determined to fight. This was high-sounding and splendid. It was the rallying cry for the Slavic peoples of that section of Europe. The great Empire of Russia was coming to the aid of the hard-pressed and about-to-be-destroyed little country of Serbia. The world properly applauded. The Russian Government, as we know, during the early years of the war was under the control of a feeble Czar a part of the time. The rest of the time and between times it was under the control of rogues and traitors within the Russian Empire whose deeds paralyzed the industrial life of Russia; paralyzed the military operations of the country. We are not concerned, however, to-day with those early events. We are concerned with the situation as it exists now and its application to the things that confront the United States.

I heartily indorse the splendid words our President used in his message, wherein he offered hope and some confidence and much sympathy for the Russian people in their present predicament.

It was proper that he should use such language, because he was speaking for the great American people the thing that was within the heart of every American—sympathy and the hope that the Russians would yet be able to do something. But at this moment I speak only for myself; I represent only my own thoughts. Therefore I can tell the naked truth.

One of the things that any Member of this Congress or any person in our Government or those of the allies ought to endeavor to learn the truth about is Russia. I made a special effort to learn all I could while I was in Europe. I had such opportunities of information as came to me and to others situated like me from official sources in France and in England, and the truth was plainly and freely told.

In addition thereto I had the good fortune to spend some days in company with a gentleman who was a member of the Root Commission, but who did not return to this country, staying in Russia seven months. His heart was in sympathy with the Russian people, and had been for many years. For many years he had known Russia and the Russian people intimately. In addition I was able to get the thought of all the correspondents of one of the greatest newspapers in the United States, men whose business it is to learn facts and report them accurately. These correspondents gathered from various parts of Russia and reported to their chief while I was there the exact conditions in various parts of the empire. In addition I had the good fortune to meet a citizen of this country from Ohio, whom I had formerly met in Minnesota, who had spent the last 17 months on business in Russia, traveling throughout that country.

I cite these things so that you may know upon what I base my conclusions. My first conclusion, my friends, is that there is absolutely no hope, none whatever, that Russia will ever again take any part in this great struggle in behalf of the allies. That is the unanimous report of every man who has studied conditions at first hand.

The revolution which occurred nearly a year ago was justified if ever one was, but unfortunately those who came into power were not possessed of that tolerance and self-respect and self-control and knowledge of conditions in the world necessary for them to have to enable them to lead their country aright. Their country has been led all wrong. Its face has been turned from the light and they have journeyed helplessly into utter darkness. It is all wrong now. It stands in a false position before humanity and before history, and there is no hope—none whatever—from the present Government of Russia. Yes; we must say, though the saying is with deep regret, Russia to-day stands a nation that began a struggle, summoned nations to her aid, and in the hour of peril forsakes her allies, abandons her cause, false to every principle honest nations and honest men respect.

Why? In the first place, those in whose hands the Russian Government rests correspond exactly to the Industrial Workers of the World in America. Their principles are the same. While government in its essence is control, to them it is license. They are abandoned to all lusts of the flesh. I. W. W. operations and I. W. W. thoughts are in control. We now look back upon the reign of Kerensky—if I may call it a reign, as he was practically a dictator—as one of ultraconservatism. And yet at the time he was extremely radical. From the time when the people representing the soldiers and the workmen came into control of Russia there has been nothing but chaos, murder, starvation, slaughter, with all the attendant evils that the mind can think of.

In the first place, Russia could not participate in this great war now if she wanted to. Why? The truth is, they have murdered practically all the officers in the Russian Army capable of leading a command to battle. To-day there exists hardly a captain or a colonel or a general, outside of a few that are left, qualified to lead their men to battle. We remember reading with much glow in our hearts that Russia had sent 50,000 men to France about two years ago, there to be trained and put into the firing line on the side of the allies. Did you ever wonder what became of them? I will tell you. They are now near a port in France, the name of which I will forego to mention. They murdered all their officers this last summer, and they are now held practically as prisoners, surrounded by French bayonets. Every element of discipline has disappeared. The units are disorganized. The armies have reverted back to a purposeless, unwieldy mob. The Russian people stand with jaws open and eyes staring, drunk with liberty. Army and Government have betrayed their country, betrayed humanity. Russia is a bear no longer, but a blatant, bleating lamb. And the German wolf is making a feast of the Russian lamb; the Russian people are blind to the necessities of existence. They have stopped the production of crops on their farms, and every report indicates that before another fall comes the gaunt specter of starvation will stalk throughout Russia. Never worry about Germany obtaining much food from Russia. Little is there, none soon will be. They have been living for a time by stealing—plainly stealing. They have confiscated the estates and nearly all the important business enterprises in Russia. At first they began to demand shorter hours and greater wages, and they continued those demands until they positively confiscated and closed up the business enterprises. They have taken the money in the banks, not only the savings but the capital of the country, and are using it, no matter to whom the money belongs. They have actually taken up the paving blocks in the city streets and are burning them for fuel. Soon buildings will be torn down and the looting of stores, long ago begun, will soon become universal. Their transportation facilities have been worn out and wrecked, and Russia remains at this time without facilities for transporting food, even if she wanted to. It would be physically impossible for her to mobilize or transport an army.

There was a time, my friends, when we thought—and we had reason for the thought—that the present Russian Government was but the paid agent of the Kaiser.

It seems that thought was not exactly justified by the facts. It now appears, if we can judge from the tidings as we get them from the newspapers and from vague reports of the peace conference that reach us from time to time, that this attempt to find a peace between Russia and Germany is sincere on the part of the present Russian Government. But that makes no difference. Whether paid by the Kaiser or not, the Russian Government's work to-day is perfectly a betrayal of the allies' cause and pro-German in its effect. And what a spectacle it presents! Here this great nation, the one that started this great war—because it rose to bid defiance to Germany—has turned itself against its friends and allies, against those that have bled and are bleeding for her, abandoning them to misery and woe. Little Roumania, that came to her aid, has been treacherously betrayed twice—first, when the invading German horde came, right after Roumania declared war, and Russia promised but failed to give her support.

Now once more, when she fraternizes with Germany and leaves little Roumania to stand there, isolated but defiant, outraged but true, all but conquered, yet valiant, and there she will stand true to the faith, though she perish from the earth. [Applause.]

I have no sympathy whatever with the present condition in Russia, and we can not expect any help from her. The truth is—a truth France, England, and Italy all know to their bitterness and sorrow—that had Russia remained in the war that war would be over now, with a complete victory for the allies. Had

Russia not betrayed the cause, that cause would have been won ere now. The men that must die from now on, the treasure that must be spent, would have been saved to the world had Russia not betrayed the allied cause.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to an inquiry?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will gladly do so.

Mr. FESS. In what proportion does the Bolsheviki movement represent the Russian people?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is something no one seems able to tell, but relatively a small portion of the people.

Mr. FESS. Are they not surprisingly succeeding in winning the people?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It seems there is no national spirit in Russia. By that I mean there is no public consciousness on any of those subjects; there is no cohesion or unity or concert of action, and a small group is able to sway Russia now and then because nobody else has any proposition to suggest. These conditions will flow into endless revolution, insurrection, and bloodshed, and the eventual break-up of Russia.

Mr. FESS. What is the gentleman's explanation of the possibility of leadership of the type of the two men who are now in the leadership? How can they lead the people?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is something I would not like to answer. I can only say that the people must be very misguided ever to have permitted them to lead them for a moment. The truth is that Russia is perfectly thoughtless and hopeless. We might just as well face that fact. In France and England they have wiped Russia off from the books, and we might just as well do that in this country. The United States must take her place among the allies and fight the battle that Russia began and then traitorously left unfinished.

Ask Italy, against whom the legions formerly on the Russian front have lately been hurled; ask her, staggering beneath these mighty blows, what she thinks of the great Russian betrayal? The present Russian Government has not been recognized and should not be by any decent people in the world.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Did not the gentleman exaggerate a little in saying that the Russian soldiers in France had murdered all their officers? I understand there are quite a number of those Russian officers in France who have asked to be taken into our Army.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is perhaps incorrect to say they have murdered all of them, because all of them were not with the troops; but they murdered the great bulk of them, just as they did in Russia, and just as they did a few weeks ago in the navy in Russia. And it might be appropriate to observe in passing that Russia contains some great military geniuses. I am told by many of the best military critics in Europe that the Grand Duke Nicholas is the greatest military genius this war has produced; but men of the character of the grand duke, or Alexis, or Korneloff, or Brusiloff would not be given one moment's chance to do anything to-day. All of those who had brains, all of those who were capable, have either been murdered or displaced, and there is no possibility of their coming back to the scene of action. They will not be allowed to come back.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As to the influence of the Bolsheviki, is it not a fact that there are many religions and very many languages throughout the great area of Russia?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There are dozens of them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are there not as many as 40 or 50 different languages spoken in Russia?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I suppose so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not that account in some degree for the present disorganized sentiment there?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think so. We have fully as many different religions in the United States as they have in Russia, but we have a national coherence, a unity of thought and purpose. We have a national consciousness.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman suggest a remedy for the present governmental conditions in Russia?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think I know the only way that a remedy will come.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it be a monarchy?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would not want to say; but I think it will be a dictatorship first and that blood will flow.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can it be a republic?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It can not be a republic unless they change their minds very materially, because they have shown themselves absolutely incapable of self-reliance or self-control. Yet every American would rather see a republic there than anything else; but until they develop some of these essential qualifications of citizenship which are necessary in a republic they can not either establish or maintain a republic. The present Government in Russia is not a republic. It has no semblance of a republic. In my judgment, revolutions will continue in Russia; successive groups of men will control for brief periods; in the end, anarchy. Then the country will break up into many, perhaps a dozen, countries, each with its own kind of government.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. REED. What relationship exists now between the Russian Embassy in this country and any Government in Russia, and to what extent are we dealing with it?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I wish I could inform the gentleman from West Virginia, but I can not, because I have tried to find out for myself and could not. I have only a very general idea, which I would prefer not to advance. But conditions in Russia are the acme of chaos. The idea was expressed here the other day that as it took many years for chaos to be turned into order in France, we could not expect Russia to change her clothes overnight. That is all true, but I am thinking about the war. I am not thinking about what Russia will be 10 years from now. I am thinking about what part Russia can or will play in this struggle that is now on hand, and of which we are a part. The plain truth is, just forget Russia. Do not spend another dollar in Russia, do not send another thing to Russia. Wipe her off the books and put our thought and attention on the problem of fighting Germany on the western front.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the gentleman any information as to what has been done with the money that we have loaned to Russia?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Well, now, I have a suspicion that it never went for any Russian purpose. It very probably did not filter down far through the hands of the gentlemen who received it. I wish I had the information to give. I have a suspicion that the gentleman from Ohio himself knows something about it, and I hope he will enlighten the House some day. I do not know.

Mr. PLATT. As a matter of fact, it was nearly all spent here for materials, rifles, and locomotives to send over there, or perhaps not all sent over there.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is a better phase of the picture than I had painted for myself. I am afraid some of it got to Russia.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it not true that much of our trouble came from building locomotives for Russia and not building those that we ourselves needed?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is absolutely correct. In France for five months they have been begging for 900 locomotives for American transportation, and during that period of time locomotives were being built and sent to Russia, which ought to have been built and sent to France for the Americans; and one of the difficulties in our transportation in France to-day is a lack of rolling stock, chief of which is the lack of locomotives, and within the United States one of our greatest needs, if not the very greatest, is a large number of locomotives for our railroads.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. In Honolulu in the latter part of November—about the 28th or 29th of November—I met a party of 30 American railroad men, all in uniform, sent over by this Government on their way to Vladivostok. That was long after this Bolsheviki crowd came pretty nearly into complete control over there. Whether these American railroad men went on or not I do not know. We evidently have had to stop sending either materials or men.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand it to be the gentleman's opinion that in the event of the breaking off of peace negotiations between Germany and Russia, Russia will not be able to put up something of a defense? Is it the gentleman's belief that in that event the Germans will practically overrun Russia?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Germany can mobilize an army and march to Moscow or Petrograd any hour she wants to, and she knows it, and the world knows it. But some advantage will come to the allies if Russia does not make a separate peace. First, 2,000,000 prisoners will not be released. Second, Russian agitators along their front, or uncertain conditions within, would keep on the eastern front a large number of German troops. While Russia can strike no blow for her own freedom, or for the allies, she can so act as to keep German troops along her front, and that would be of great value to the allied cause.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I thank the committee for its attention. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, without discussing the items in this bill affecting the Five Civilized Tribes, I wish to make a few general observations on the Indian question. Having lived for a long time in the Indian Territory and enjoyed a large clientele among the Indian citizens, I feel that I know something of the condition of the Indians in my State and the treatment accorded them by the agents of the Indian Bureau. I lived in the Territory at a time when the Indians in the central and southern part of the Territory owned their lands in common and well remember when many full-blood Indians lived in little huts back in the hill country in the timberlands, with only a little "Tom Fuller" patch in cultivation, while the more enterprising members of the tribe were controlling and had under fence hundreds and thousands of acres of the fertile lands and were exceedingly prosperous. Although these full-blood Indians living in the unsettled part of the country were violently opposed to the scheme of the Government to allot their land to them in severalty, and even at this day many of them, known as Snake Indians, have refused to accept their patents or per capita payments or to have anything to do with the Government or its agents, yet their condition has been very much improved, and so much so that many of them are making a success in business ventures. At the time the allotment of lands was made a great many of these Snake Indians refused to come to the land office to make their selection for themselves or their children, and after waiting quite a long time the United States Government proceeded to arbitrarily allot them upon the remaining lands of the tribe. Their allotments were necessarily taken out of the leavings, as it were, and were not as fertile as those who were more thrifty and who selected the better lands. However, good fortune did not abandon these full bloods, because oil was subsequently discovered and in many instances on these unfertile allotments. This resulted in the accumulation of much wealth to the individual full-blood Indians, especially of the Creek and Choctaw Tribes.

The Indian question has been dealt with many times from a sentimental viewpoint, which has proven very detrimental to the welfare of the Indians. The average citizen, far removed from the abode of the Indian, looks upon him from the viewpoint of the storybooks of his childhood, much of which was fiction emanating from the fertile brain of an imaginative author. Thousands of Americans when you speak to them of an Indian tribe at once think of blanketed Indians in moccasins, living in tepees, hunting and fishing for a living. This type of the American Indian has yielded to the influence of civilization.

In the State of Oklahoma, where over 115,000 enrolled members of Indian tribes live, 100,000 of them are members of the Five Civilized Tribes. These Five Civilized Tribes comprise Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, Chickasaws, and Choctaws. Some of these tribes have had written constitutions and a code of laws, with three separate departments of government for over 100 years. Prior to the abolition of their tribal government these several tribes conducted their tribal affairs through their executive, legislative, and judicial departments with marked ability. The chief complaint of the Indians of my section of the country is the unnecessary restraint and red-tape methods of the local representatives of the Indian Bureau. There is but one policy to pursue to intelligently and effectively deal with the Indian question as a whole, and that is clearly stated in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to wit:

> Each individual must be considered in the light of his own environments and capacity for larger responsibilities and privileges.

These sentiments state the crux of the whole matter, but unfortunately for the Indian and the people who live in the Indian country the subordinate agents and officers have never been able to grasp this great principle that has been expressed by the present Indian Commissioner.

On the 17th of April, 1917, the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs issued his declaration of policy in the administration of Indian Affairs and published the same throughout the country, which declaration is as follows:

> DECLARATION OF POLICY IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.
>
> During the past four years the efforts of the administration of Indian affairs have been largely concentrated on the following fundamental activities: The betterment of health conditions of Indians, the suppression of the liquor traffic among them, the improvement of their industrial conditions, the further development of vocational training in their schools, and the protection of the Indians' property. Rapid progress has been made along all these lines, and the work thus reorganized and revitalized will go on with increased energy. With these activities and accomplishments well under way, we are now ready to take the next step in our administrative program.
>
> The time has come for discontinuing guardianship of all competent Indians and giving even closer attention to the incompetent that they may more speedily achieve competency.
>
> Broadly speaking, a policy of greater liberalism will henceforth prevail in Indian administration to the end that every Indian, as soon as he has been determined to be as competent to transact his own business as the average white man, shall be given full control of his property and have all his lands and moneys turned over to him, after which he will no longer be a ward of the Government.
>
> Pursuant to this policy, the following rules shall be observed:
>
> 1. Patents in fee: To all able-bodied adult Indians of less than one-half Indian blood there will be given, as far as may be under the law, full and complete control of all their property. Patents in fee shall be issued to all adult Indians of one-half or more Indian blood who may, after careful investigation, be found competent, provided that where deemed advisable patents in fee shall be withheld for not to exceed 40 acres as a home.
>
> Indian students, when they are 21 years of age or over, who complete the full course of instruction in the Government schools, receive diplomas, and have demonstrated competency, will be so declared.
> 2. Sale of lands.—A liberal ruling will be adopted in the matter of passing upon applications for the sale of inherited Indian lands where the applicants retain other lands and the proceeds are to be used to improve the homesteads or for other equally good purpose. A more liberal ruling than has hitherto prevailed will hereafter be followed with regard to the applications of noncompetent Indians for the sale of their lands where they are old and feeble and need the proceeds for their support.
>
> 3. Certificates of competency.—The rules which are made to apply in the granting of patents in fee and the sale of lands will be made equally applicable in the matter of issuing certificates of competency.
>
> 4. Individual Indian moneys.—Indians will be given unrestricted control of all their individual Indian moneys upon issuance of patents in fee or certificates of competency. Strict limitations will not be placed upon the use of funds of the old, the indigent, and the invalid.
>
> 5. Pro rata shares—Trust funds.—As speedily as possible, their pro rata shares in tribal trust or other funds shall be paid to all Indians who have been declared competent, unless the legal status of such funds prevents. Where practicable the pro rata shares of incompetent Indians will be withdrawn from the Treasury and placed in banks to their individual credit.
>
> 6. Elimination of ineligible pupils from the Government Indian schools.—In many of our boarding schools Indian children are being educated at Government expense whose parents are amply able to pay for their education and have public-school facilities at or near their homes. Such children shall not hereafter be enrolled in Government Indian schools supported by gratuity appropriations, except on payment of actual per capita cost and transportation.
>
> These rules are hereby made effective, and all Indian Bureau administrative officers at Washington and in the field will be governed accordingly.
>
> There is a new and far-reaching declaration of policy. It means the dawn of a new era in Indian administration. It means that the competent Indian will no longer be treated as half ward and half citizen. It means reduced appropriations by the Government and more self-respect and independence for the Indian. It means the ultimate absorption of the Indian race into the body politic of the Nation; it means, in short, the beginning of the end of the Indian problem.
>
> In carrying out this policy I cherish the hope that all real friends of the Indian race will lend their aid and hearty cooperation.
> CATO SELLS, Commissioner.
> Approved:
> FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

This declaration of the policy of the Government met a hearty response from the Indians and their white neighbors throughout the Five Civilized Tribes, but unfortunately the spirit of that declaration and policy has never permeated the brain of the local Indian agents in the Five Civilized Tribes. There is more red tape and more restriction upon the action and freedom of the members of the Five Civilized Tribes to-day than ever in the history of these nations.

As to the conditions in other parts of the country, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] recently in a very forcible and truthful manner called the attention of the House to some of the red-tape methods in vogue in the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Misrepresentations as to the ability of Indians to attend to their own affairs have been made by some to impress the necessity of their being retained on the pay roll of the United States Government. Any man who will go and talk with the members of the Five Civilized Tribes and secure a free expression from them, will find a universal complaint against the methods pursued in handling their individual funds. Every citizen, Indian and white alike, in the Five Civilized Tribes felt that the bureau at Washington was sincere in the declaration of April 17, 1917, of a liberal policy, and they still have faith in it, but are unable to understand why the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the bureau at Washington will permit subordinates, agents, and officers to thwart and suppress this policy advocated and set out by the commissioner. Congress has appropriated per capita payments to the members of the Seminole, Choctaw, and Chickasaw Tribes, containing a provision permitting the Secretary of the Interior to supervise the payment of these funds to the restricted Indians. This is a wise provision, and if administered with the spirit and in conformity with the policy enunciated there would be no complaint, but, as one of the full-blood Indians of the Seminole Tribe said:

> It is harder to get the money from the Indian agent after Congress appropriates it than to get Congress to make the appropriation.

Under the appropriation act approved May 18, 1916, $300 per capita payment was granted to the Seminole Indians, effective July 1, 1916. I have a case of one Indian in mind, a Seminole, with a fair education, who is a better penman than myself, who made application for his $300 and signed the receipt for same on the 26th day of September, 1916, and on the 20th day of December, 1917, 15 months later, he managed to receive his $300 with $9.46 interest.

In the meantime Congress passed a bill appropriating a per capita payment of $200 to the Seminoles on March 2, 1917, but on account of a construction of the act by the Treasury Department only $33 per capita was available. This one instance discloses the unnecessary delay in the hands of the subordinate agents of the bureau.

In May, 1917, my attention was called to a case of a Choctaw Indian for whom $300 was appropriated in the same act of Congress, effective July 1, 1916, who suffered a loss by fire of 10,000 rails around his farm. He tried to get his per capita payment to buy wire with which to rebuild his fence, and he was informed that his money was loaned to a bank at 3 per cent interest and could not be paid. Similar complaints from members of the Choctaw Tribe, who had not been paid their pro rata payment, or any part thereof, and the condition of the Indians was forcibly set out by Dr. G. W. Hawkins, a very prominent and reliable member of the Choctaw Tribe, from whose letter I quote as follows:

If the Government is not going to pay the Indians, then make some ruling whereby the Indians can get something to eat and a few clothes every month. It is a shame for a person to be cold and hungry and have money and can not get it with which to buy something to eat and a few clothes.

I called the department's attention to this condition, and an investigation was ordered in reference to these particular cases. But there are many of these cases where the delay in payment has been unreasonable and unjustified. The red tape used is ridiculous to the average business man. As an example, the full-blood Indian will be notified to meet the agent at the county site on a given date and receive his per capita payment. He will proceed to the county site on the day mentioned, paying railroad fare and hotel bills, and every man who is familiar with the characteristics of the full-blood Indian knows that when he starts on a trip to receive money he takes with him his wife, children, and even the dogs. When he arrives at the Indian agent's office he is presented with a receipt, which he signs, for a small portion of his per capita payment and is informed that it will be necessary for him to return the next week, as this voucher must go to the office at Muskogee before the check can be returned. The result is that he will make three or four such trips to finally receive a payment of $25, which is entirely insufficient to pay the cost and expenses that he has incurred during the time he was waiting to get his payment.

Some of the Indians with several thousands of dollars of individual funds have suffered great hardship at the hands of these agents. I have in mind an old Indian sixty-odd years old, who has in the Treasury of the United States approximately $84,000. He is afflicted with kidney trouble and is absolutely unable to get the department to buy him a home in which to live, and is furnished a home for himself and family, for which the department allows the munificent sum of $15 per month rent, all because he is not willing to live in the county that the department clerks want him to live, and in order to force him to live where they wish to they refuse to pay him sufficient money to own a home. They seek to justify their action on the ground that there is some conflict in guardianship cases pending, and they are willing to sit by while probably rival banks are fighting over the guardianship of his money and permit him to pass out of this world in poverty while owning a substantial fortune.

Another Indian that I know of has over $200,000 in the Treasury of the United States derived from royalties of the oil taken from his allotment, with $50,000 invested in liberty bonds, and with as much as $100,000 of his money at one time in banks without interest, and yet not permitted to enjoy the interest on his money, but must be satisfied to mainain himself and family of several members on the sum of $300 per month.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will.

Mr. PLATT. In case Indians bought liberty bonds, can the commissioner prevent them from collecting the coupons?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. That is very surprising.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am not complaining at the policy of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or of the bureau at Washington, because I believe they are sincere in the declaration of their policy announced on the 17th day of April, 1917; but I am complaining of the action of the subordinate officers in the bureau in the Five Civilized Tribes in their failure to carry out the policy announced from Washington.

I wish to commend the policy of the department as set out in rule 1, which is as follows:

1. Patents in fee: To all able-bodied adult Indians of less than one-half Indian blood there will be given, as far as may be under the law, full and complete control of all their property. Patents in fee shall be issued to all adult Indians of one-half or more Indian blood who may, after careful investigation, be found competent: Provided, That where deemed advisable patents in fee shall be withheld for not to exceed 40 acres as a home.

In this connection I wish to say that no better opportunity is offered the Bureau of Indian Affairs than at the present time to put that rule into force in the Five Civilized Tribes. In the Chickasaw and Choctaw Nations each man, woman, and child whose name was on the approved roll receive an allotment of an average of 320 acres, the Creeks 160 acres, the Seminoles 80 acres. It is not an infrequent occurrence in the Choctaw and Chickasaw country that one family will own an aggregate of 2,500 acres of the average land of that country, much of which is very fertile and productive. The lands in the hands of the members of these tribes are not taxable under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, although the same may be alienable. The holding of these large tracts of land, which is far in excess of the amount of land that can be cultivated by the Indian citizen, has created a very bad situation in Oklahoma. The larger portion of lands must of necessity be cultivated by tenants, and the tenant system is detrimental to the welfare of the landlord as well as the tenant. This system retards the growth and development of the country and works a great hardship and burden upon those who bear the burdens of government. The short term of tenancy creates unstable communities, and the housing conditions become fearful. This condition should be remedied by the Indian Bureau, permitting the adult Indians to select not to exceed 80 acres for a home and to sell the remaining portion of the allotment to the farmers who are ever anxious to secure homes, with a provision that no deed shall be approved to any one purchaser to exceed 160 acres of tillable land or 640 acres of grazing land. The money derived from the sale of the lands in excess of the amount selected as a homestead would be sufficient to erect permanent and valuable improvements upon the homestead and to equip it so that the Indian will be able to live decently and produce and make his own way in the world. I am a firm believer in legislation that looks to the protection of the incompetent members of the Indian tribes in their property and rights to property, but I also believe in a liberal policy, dealing with each individual Indian according to his intelligence and ability irrespective of his quantum of blood. This is a propitious time to put in effect the liberal policy of the department in reference to developing the Indian country, and if I can be of any assistance in correcting erroneous methods and bring about a sane and sensible administration of Indian affairs in the Five Civilized Nations I shall feel repaid for the many days spent in studying this problem. If the Government shall permit the ambitious tenant farmers of the Nation to become home owners and to develop the country side by side with his Indian neighbor, then I have no fear of the future welfare of the Indian of these tribes. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 195. An act providing for the sale of the coal and asphalt in the segregated mineral land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Oklahoma.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7697) to authorize the calling into the service of the United States the militia and other locally created armed forces in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I would not occupy any time of the House in discussing this bill were it not for the fact that I have been deluged with telegrams concerning the order promulgated this morning by the Fuel Director concerning the production of coal and the shutting down of the factories. The district that I represent has coal mines, glass factories, and iron mills of that character, and they are prohibited from using fuel for five days from this date, the factories shall continue closed, and the men employed must remain idle.

Under clause "a," section 3, of this unprecedented order, which has produced such a calamity among the people of Pennsylvania and elsewhere, it is provided that "plants which necessarily must be continuously operated seven days each week to avoid serious injury to the plant itself, or its contents, may use only such quantity of fuel as is necessary to prevent such injury to the plant or its contents."

I was quite amazed a few minutes ago to hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] state on the floor of this House that he contended that those who said that this order closed down the factories were talking without knowing what they were talking about. I was puzzled to understand the meaning of that statement. I do not divulge any secret on the floor when I say that I visited the Fuel Administrator's office this morning and asked whether it meant that the factories should be closed. I was told that the purpose of that section and of the order was that every factory should stop for five days; that they should be patriotic and stand still, in order that the transportation of the country might catch up and relieve the ships in the harbor of New York waiting for coal. Therefore I am confronted with telegrams which I have received informing me that the great glass works in my district are to be closed. They do not use coal, but natural gas, and they must stop work, and this product, while it can be kept in a molten condition in the great tanks in which it is melted, will be utterly destroyed, because it can only be renewed by placing raw material in one end of the tank and withdrawing the finished product out at the other end, and when this process can not be continued the glass will be ruined and useless.

I was told that one of the great factories in my district own their own coal, which they haul in their own wagons to their furnaces, must stop also, although they use no part of the transportation of and do not depend upon any public utility.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I have in my district industries which have used the "squirrel wisdom" referred to by my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. MOORE, and bought several acres of coal land. They have no facility for shipping it, and it is used exclusively to run these plants, which are located near the mine opening. There are others having their own gas wells for manufacturing purposes only. Do I understand that these factories having their own fuel supply already provided are to be closed down?

Mr. ROBBINS. Those factories must stop. That is the interpretation placed upon it by one who stands high in the fuel administration, the highest we can get to see when we call, because nobody can see the administrator—he is always in conference or out when a Congressman calls.

More than that, one of the largest factories in western Pennsylvania, engaged in making munitions and Government supplies for the Navy, owns its own coal fields and transports the coal over the Monongahela River in its own boats, and yet under this unjust and oppressive order it must stop.

There is one thing about this order that the Fuel Administrator has never thought of, and that is that when he stops the factories from operating he ought to have a magic power to stop the appetites of these workmen whose wages he cuts off. All over the country thousands of men are working with these high prices confronting them. Day after day they earn the money to purchase the bread and clothing for their family. If they are to stop for five successive days without earning a cent, who is to feed their wives and children and clothe them? I notice some patriotic allusions made to the proposition that the employers ought to pay them, although they are not working. Why, Mr. Chairman, in the face of the great war taxes assessed on these manufacturers and on the employers of labor, it is impossible to ask them to do that thing. If I had time I would like to go over the coal situation briefly. [Applause.]

In June a conference was called of all the coal men of the United States here in Washington. It was presided over by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane. It was then agreed that $3 a ton would be a fair price to be fixed for bituminous coal. The coal men went home, believing that to be true, and started their mines and made every effort and in good faith endeavored to produce all the coal possible. If this program had been followed there would be no shortage of coal now.

A few days later it was reported in the public press that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy repudiated this price, said it was too high, and refused to pay it for the Government coal, and on the 23d of August the Fuel Administrator promulgated a price of $2 a ton. The immediate effect of this was to stop a large number of coal mines in my district. In western Pennsylvania 61 found it impossible to produce coal and closed. Practically all the wagon mines in the country were compelled to stop shipments because bituminous coal could not be mined and transported to the railroad by wagons or trucks and pay the high cost of labor and materials prevailing in the mining regions at $2 per ton.

Moreover, in the thin-vein coal seams, where mining conditions were difficult and cost of production higher than in the thick vein, there was a great decrease in production under this drastic order fixing the price at $2 to the consumer f. o. b. mines. It became very apparent that the production of coal was dropping off and that great scarcity of coal would confront the country this winter.

I addressed the House on this subject September 28, and said, among other things, this:

> If that policy ($2 coal) is pursued and relief is not given to the bituminous coal interests of western Pennsylvania, there will be this winter a stringency in coal that will be felt not only among the domestic consumers but among the mills and large furnaces as well.

Some time in October an increase of 45 cents per ton was made, with 75 cents for hauling charges, but this was insufficient to stimulate production; and yet, in the face of repeated protests, that price still stands.

All through November and December another policy was inaugurated which bore heavily on this coal situation. A system of preferential orders was inaugurated, whereby the Fuel Administration in Washington and the various fuel administrators throughout the country were given the right to order coal shipped to others than the regular consumer or the consignees of the coal producers. In many instances this caused cross-hauls, tying up of transportation, and caused endless delays. Seven different agencies in Washington alone were issuing these preferential orders. As if this was not enough, during November a certain week was set aside when all the coal was shipped to the Great Lakes, and thousands of cars were tied up at Lake ports without boats to transport it. Then another period was set aside for transporting coal to New England, and there were thousands of cars diverted into that trade, congesting the terminal points in the East, with a lack of water transportation to take the coal from the docks. This so demoralized the railroads that on the 28th of December the President took over the railroads and appointed the Secretary of the Treasury Director General. But apparently matters have grown considerably worse, and now we have this unannounced and drastic order suspending all shipments from all manufactories east of the Mississippi River over the railroads. This situation is certainly deplorable. It points, without a doubt, to the inefficiency of the management of the transportation system of the country.

The working people of this country have shown their patriotism beyond all precedent. During the recess I made many speeches in western Pennsylvania, and at all of them were crowds of all classes of people, and the working people invariably contributed to the Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, liberty bonds, and are now purchasing thrift stamps to the full extent of their ability. This order proposes to suspend their income entirely for 15 days, but it has not suspended their living expenses. They must eat and live during this time without any income. As I stated above, the employers can not afford to pay wages with no production, because they have contributed largely to these war activities, and most of these people do piecework. Some of the coal companies in my district have contributed as much as $25,000 to the war funds, and all of them have contributed out of their personal accounts large sums of money for war purposes. Hence they are all in the same position, employer and employee alike. The income of both the employer and employee is affected and is by this arbitrary, drastic, and far-reaching order cut off. It is impossible to estimate the wages that will be lost. It will certainly amount to over $100,000,000. And it is impossible to estimate the amount of the loss of the manufacturers. They must keep their factories warm, which requires a large amount of fuel, and this is lost, because its energy could largely be used in operating the works instead of merely heating the plants.

If Dr. Garfield, the Fuel Administrator, has made this sweeping order, stilling the wheels of industry, and has in some instances stopped the coal mines from operating—because I have a telegram to-day from a coal operator to the effect that the railroad company refuses to move any coal cars during this suspension—then this is a transportation problem and not a manufacturing difficulty. I also have word that factories operated by coal, hauled in their own wagons or transported in their own boats, or whose fuel is natural gas or water, have also been compelled to shut down. This indicates the very unfair character of this order. Its true purpose is, therefore, not to save fuel, but it is to relieve railroad transportation. Hence the Fuel Administrator should not have come to the rescue of the Railroad Director and thereby cause this widespread dissatisfaction and distress. The thousands of workingmen throughout the country will not be appeased by the simple statement that it is necessary in order to coal ships in New York Harbor. If the Director of the Railroads had operated them properly since the 28th of December, when they were taken over, there would not have been this coal shortage at New York. There are thousands of cars of coal on the sidetracks of the railroads that could have been moved to and used by the ships that now require fuel.

It is a poor answer to say that the men in the trenches need commodities that these ships must transport. The men in the trenches may need that, they also need, as the testimony before the Senate committee showed, the clothing, tents, munitions, and supplies that our working people here would so gladly make for them in these 15 days of enforced idleness, and our working people need the bread and clothing and necessaries of life that they could have earned in these 15 days, which they must now do without, because of the hardship and deprivation forced upon them by this order which has taken away their wages.

Mr. Chairman, it is the fashion on the floor of this House that when anyone rises to criticize the faults of anyone connected with this administration, they are charged with being unpatriotic and partisan. I believe that fair criticism of the inefficient officials of this administration, or any of its improper activities, is one of the best ways to call attention of the President and of the country to such faults, troubles, and incompetency as has developed since the war began in the management of the same.

I have since the meeting of Congress, last April, stood manfully up for the President and the administration and am doing so to-day. I have supported every measure thought necessary by the administration or put forward by it for the purpose of winning this war and to sustain and support our gallant soldiers in the training camps and in the trenches, and I shall continue to do so during the war; but I must not be unmindful of the people at home, who in this extraordinarily cold and severe winter will be deprived of the necessaries of life by this unusual, hasty, and arbitrary order of the Fuel Administrator, cutting off their wages for 15 days, which I believe to be unjust and unreasonable.

Let us hope that this discussion in Congress will call the attention of the President and the Fuel Administrator to its disastrous effect on our people and our industries, and that they will quickly revoke it. This course alone will save our workmen and their families from great suffering and distress and continue the flow of guns, munitions, and clothing which our brave and patriotic soldiers so greatly need in order to win this war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the fuel situation, which is, I presume, about the same in every other large city in the country as in Washington, has brought about the issuance of the recent order suspending certain industries for a limited time. I do not believe those Members of Congress who have inveighed so viciously against this order have come in close enough contact with the real fuel situation in this city to actually realize and understand the necessity for this order. I have had a little personal experience with the coal situation which now confronts this city. I have not been fortunate enough in these times of a perilous fuel situation to live in either a hotel or an apartment house, but rent a little house out in the northwest section, which imposes upon my family and myself the necessity of supplying our own fuel. There has been scarcely a day for the last month that the bottom of my coal bin was not visible to the naked eye. For three days, when the thermometer registered way down below the freezing point, there was not one lump of furnace coal in my residence. We managed to keep ourselves from intense suffering by having a wood fire in one room in the house and bringing the entire family into that room. One afternoon the bottom of the wood bin became visible, and it seemed that the Carter family was due to go to bed and get up without any kind of fuel. This was a comforting situation, with the thermometer hovering around zero, and was only averted by borrowing a few buckets of soft coal from a neighbor. That is but a personal selfish aspect of the situation, which can be averted by moving my family back to Oklahoma, the State of coal, wood, gas, and oil.

There is, however, another more serious situation. My attempts to secure coal for my household made necessary various and sundry trips to the offices of coal dealers, Fuel Administration, and other sources of coal supply. During the most intense cold I witnessed long lines of people standing before these places begging to hand over their money for delivery of a few bushels of coal to keep their families from sickness and freezing. But, in the words of a famous evangelist, there was "nothing doing." Some of them were well to do and some of them poor.

The better half of my family responded to the call of the Washington Post for the delivery of fuel to poor families in this city. Later on she was engaged in Red Cross work, which consumed one day of her time each week in delivery of provisions, fuel, and other supplies to poor people of this city. The harrowing tales she brought to me of the suffering she witnessed with her own eyes from lack of fuel is something I believe would cause some of these gentlemen to stop and consider a moment before giving vent to such bitter denunciations as I have heard upon the floor of this House the past two days.

I heard of a family with a little girl confined to her bed lying at death's very door with no sign of fuel to heat the room and keep the pangs of cold from chilling her body through. Then of a lady taking care of her old invalid mother with no coal, no wood, in fact, no fuel of any kind to warm the premises. Both these poor families had a little money left from their weekly earnings with which to purchase fuel if it could be had at any price, and both were finally furnished some, but not until after some considerable suffering had been experienced. These are just a few examples of many instances.

Now, just a word as to the cause of this situation. It has been stated from that side of the House that these causes run all the way from having Democrats in office to absolute and puerile incompetency. In my opinion, the cause is due more to lack of transportation than to lack of fuel. Lack of transportation, in a large measure, may be charged up to the account of dearth of labor. It is an incontestable fact that no such demand for labor has ever existed in the past as at the present day. Gentlemen must remember that our country is in the throes of war, making excessive demands on our man power. More than 1,000,000 units, the flower of America's productive capacity, have been called to the colors. Furthermore, I think every fair-minded man will admit that the present generation has never witnessed such a wave of cold weather as has visited the eastern section of our country this year. The railroads were taken over by the Federal Government on December 28, and I am advised that shortly after that there was considerable improvement in the fuel situation throughout the country, but the recent cold wave has been so severe, so unprecedented that it has frozen up the water around the docks so that boats could not get up to unload coal. It has frozen coal in the cars so it could not be unloaded without great difficulty. Why, the recent cold wave has been so severe that I understand it has frozen Chesapeake Bay solidly all the way down to Norfolk, Va., something which Virginia people tell us has not occurred before during the lifetime of their oldest inhabitant. Tugboats and other instrumentalities of the Navy have been used to break up the ice, and in one case a battleship was commandeered for ice-breaking service, resulting in releasing 15 ships in one day. These conditions were not brought about by any party, and I know my good friend from Kansas, who I see is on his feet, will not make that claim.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Oklahoma be good enough to explain just how closing down the manufacturing establishments of this section of the country will relieve the situation to which he refers?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They will not consume coal during this heatless period, and the coal can be used for other purposes. That seems to be as plain as can be.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But it has been stated here this morning that they must use the coal and are permitted to use 75 per cent of the coal they ordinarily use in order to keep their properties from being destroyed altogether.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I know nothing of such statement or its authenticity; but, granting its truth, what has that to do with an office building?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Nothing.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Is that true of a theater?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is true of a factory.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Is it true of a dry-goods store?

Mr. PLATT. It is true of an office building that you have to keep steam in the radiators.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Oh, my friend shows that he has no experience with this fuel situation or cold weather. Many families in this city have had to drain their radiators half a dozen times in the last three weeks.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Fuel Administrator yesterday stated before a committee of another jurisdiction that it was not his intention to commandeer the coal in these factories or other places, but it was to remain there and be used when they were permitted to reopen. How is that going to relieve the shortage, if the coal in these factories is not going to be taken and distributed?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not know that the Fuel Administrator said any such thing. The gentleman may be correct, and I do not dispute it; but even so, that does not apply to hundreds of other industries where the coal will not be used.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Why did not the Fuel Administrator close the theaters and saloons and office buildings and let run the factories that are manufacturing war materials?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The order does exempt factories necessary to war purposes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no.

Mr. PLATT. Why do we not begin near home and have a few less lights burning in this Capitol, in the corridors, and elsewhere where they are not needed?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I would be very glad to support a resolution of that kind, if the gentleman will show his good faith by introducing and pushing it.

Mr. LENROOT. How could the gentleman have it considered?

Mr. BRITTEN. We were informed in the Committee on Naval Affairs this morning that to-day 770 factories manufacturing munitions or ordnance for the Navy alone are closed because of this fuel order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, a man can get almost any kind of statement he wants before a committee of Congress, from skinning an elephant on down to dehorning a coyote.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have two telegrams, one from the Latrobe Steel Co. and one from the Electric Iron Co., of Latrobe, both engaged in manufacturing munitions, protesting that they are shut down by virtue of this order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will take that up with the proper authorities he can get that situation relieved, if it ought to be. Mr. Chairman, since I have been in Congress for 10 years I have made but one partisan speech, and I admit that I have sometimes felt a little ashamed of some of my asseverations at that time. But I have heard some pretty strong partisan remarks in the last few days from gentlemen whom I thought might have been engaged in a little better business at this critical time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I did not refer to the gentleman from Kansas. We all know he is never partisan.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am well aware of that, but I wanted to ask the gentleman another question before he leaves the main question.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Why was it necessary to close down the factories that are running by water power?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not know that will be done.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the order——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The order may have included them, but the order is for an entirely different proposition and I have no doubt that the matter will be adjusted before the factories close—now, one minute.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Oklahoma gave a pathetic picture of conditions that exist with respect to the use of fuel in families as a reason for this astounding order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I said the gentleman from Oklahoma gave a pathetic picture of the pitiful conditions that exist in families for the want of fuel as the reason for the astounding order that was issued by the Fuel Administrator or by the President through the Fuel Administrator.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, why should the factories that are run by water power be included within that order?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I have answered as best I could, telling the gentleman his remedy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Just let me get through with one at a time. The gentleman calls this an astounding order. Does it astound gentlemen on the other side of the House because somebody has the courage to come out on behalf of the poor people of this country who are suffering from the pangs of cold and hunger? [Applause.] I do not doubt it astounded some, but I never thought it would astound my good friend from Kansas.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. The New York World, the organ and mouthpiece of this administration, called it that yesterday in headlines across the front page.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I am not so close to the administration as my good friend from Wisconsin as to speak with authority and say that this or that organ is the mouthpiece of the administration.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, it is a Democratic paper.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Oh, the gentleman now modifies his statement. I do know this, that a newspaper is no exception to the rule of humanity. It can "holler" just as loud as any dog in the bunch when it gets hit by a stick or a stone thrown into the flock.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman close enough to the administration to reveal to us whether this order for a workless day came from the Fuel Administrator himself or from some other source?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman must know the brutal fact, I have never gotten close enough to this administration since it has been in power to even get a janitor appointed, but I do not take that for an excuse to embarrass my country at this critical time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that the whole purpose of this order is to stop production?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman think that that order was issued for the sole and only purpose of stopping production?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do; and I will tell the gentleman why.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman does not think, then, that it was issued for the purpose of caring for the people who are suffering for coal and food in cities?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will tell the gentleman why. My belief is this order was issued for the purpose of stopping production in industrial establishments for a period of five days in order not to clog the railroads with any newly manufactured articles.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That was merely incidental to the main purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They did not want the mills to run in any kind of production, whether it resulted from water power or power generated by coal; all is to be stopped.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask me a question. I did not yield for him to make a speech.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought the gentleman wanted to answer the question. I say the proposition means to stop production in industry for five days, that the railroads may catch up with the business by taking no more new business.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; and in order that coal may be conserved.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That there shall be no business for five days.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I would like to use a little of my own time, if possible to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will yield to the gentleman in a few moments. Now, Mr. Chairman, some of our friends on that side of the aisle have railed considerably at the present administration for not turning these matters over to Republicans. It has even been stated that no Republican had anything whatever to do with the matter. Now, let us see about that. As a matter of fact, no President in the past can present a record of nonpartisanship in making appointments equal to that of the present occupant of the White House. Why, the very man who issued this order—Dr. Garfield—is himself the son of a former Republican President of the United States.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, as a Representative from the State of Ohio, I can assure the gentleman that Dr. Garfield strenuously supported President Wilson.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I understand just as many other good Republicans; but always previous to that he voted the Republican ticket.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not since Mr. Wilson was a candidate.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Now, let me ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], since he seems to be well informed as to who are Democrats, about several other gentlemen. When these railroads were taken over it was necessary to take over a general manager of each railroad and place him in the Government service, and they are the gentlemen who are running the railroads at this time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. For a dollar a year.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Perhaps the gentleman knows something of Mr. A. H. Smith, manager of the New York Central. Will any Member on that side arise and dispute that he is a Republican? That is one of the most important roads in the section of the country affected by this order and I understand one of the most congested.

Then I ask my friend from Ohio about Mr. Daniel Willard, the manager of the Baltimore & Ohio. I understand him to be a Republican, and was just so advised.

Mr. LONGWORTH. An ardent supporter of President Wilson.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Nevertheless a Republican. Then there is Mr. Samuel Rea, of the Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. An excellent Democrat, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Oh, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I observed his utterances.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I have just been advised by a gentleman who knows Mr. Rea quite well that he is a Republican.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will stand corrected, because Mr. Rea supported Mr. Wilson in the campaign. He may regret it now. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I am advised that Mr. Samuel Rea is a Republican, and that he did not support Mr. Wilson. I do not know from what source the gentleman gets all his information.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will ask the gentleman if he knows the politics of Gen. Leonard Wood?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I never heard of an Army officer having any politics.

Then, there is Mr. Ashton, of the Chicago & North Western, a stanch Republican. Possibly somebody can tell me about him. Nobody seems to respond, so I suppose he is one of the few Republicans who did not support Mr. Wilson.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He must be a Democrat. We have not heard from him.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; and there are some Republicans whose fame does not extend very far beyond the doors of this Chamber.

Then, there is Mr. Markham, the general manager of the Illinois Central.

Mr. MASON. I think he is a neutral. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; he is a Republican who supported Mr. Hughes in the last campaign.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we on this side wanted to reply in kind to the real mean, partisan statements that have emanated from that side of the Chamber, we might be vindictive enough to assert that all these Republican managers of these great railroads are not themselves giving the loyal support to this administration that they should, because they want to discredit it as a Democratic administration. But I do not believe that, and I do not propose to say it.

I do believe, however, Mr. Chairman, that the President of the United States, in approving this order, has done a real courageous thing. I want to congratulate my friends across the aisle for having up to this time given loyal support to this administration during this critical period; but while their support has been appreciated I think it will be admitted by all that the President himself has done very few things on which a Member of Congress or any other person could afford to raise an issue or difference. Therefore, my friends across the aisle have been goping about in the dark, as it were, for an issue, and now they think they have found it. This new order may be unpopular in sections where the fuel situation is not acute. I suspect that it will be more or less unpopular in my own State, for we have few large cities there and abundant coal deposits; but however that may be, whatever else may be said of the President, not one of us who knows anything about him will ever undertake to say he is not possessed of remarkable political acumen. I know my friends over there will agree that he would never issue an important order like this without taking public opinion into consideration. This being true, we can not assume that the President permitted this order to be issued without first placing in the balance the weight of public opinion. If he did this and he issued an order which he believed to be unpopular, then he subordinated politics for that which he knew to be just and right, and in this perilous crisis, with the life of the Nation in the balance, instead of this captious carping and fault-finding we should raise our voices in praise of the man who has the courage to do right in the face of adverse public sentiment and who never falters in his efforts in behalf of his suffering countrymen. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, sundry messages, in writing, from the President, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, were received.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS].

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, on Thursday morning, January 17, 1918, the newspapers published to the country the startling information that, beginning on the following day, all industries east of the Mississippi River, including those also in Minnesota and Louisiana, were to suspend operation for a period of 5 days and 1 day a week thereafter for 10 weeks. This announcement was the first notice which either Congress or the people had that such a drastic step was even contemplated. This action on the part of the Fuel Administrator was so radical and sweeping in its character that Members of the Congress at each end of this Capitol were stunned by the news at its first reading. They could not believe that such unbusinesslike action could possibly be taken, and many said that if any such order had been made it would be revoked by the President before night. But when it was found that this order had already received the approbation of the President, that he had in fact taken a stand in favor of stopping all the industries east of the Mississippi River for two weeks, thereby bringing inevitable distress upon millions of men and women employed in those establishments, vigorous and earnest protest was made in both branches of Congress.

Senator GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, presented a resolution in that body calling for delay until the ma ter could be investigated, and Senator HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska, secured action in the Senate at an early hour of the day upon a resolution which had been introduced by him, and which requested postponement of action upon this order for five days. Later in the day, after a most spirited debate, in which the action of the Fuel Administrator was most severely criticized by many Senators, the Hitchcock resolution received the approval of the Senate by a vote of 50 to 19.

In this body, in which I have the honor to be a Member, the feeling was intense that a great national injury to business, industry, and the working people of this country had been made by the present Fuel Administration in shutting down for 14 days a large per cent of its vast industries. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] presented a resolution to the House, which voiced my views and which read as follows:

Resolved, That the House regrets the summary action of the Fuel Administrator in suddenly closing the industries dependent upon a coal supply, and in view of the disorganization of business certain to follow and the consequent idleness and distress of labor, urges a reconsideration of the order by the President, and that final action be taken only after being fully advised of its effect.

Unanimous consent was asked for the immediate consideration of this resolution, and after a short debate the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], a Democrat, getting recognition from the Speaker, said:

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to let this resolution go through by unanimous consent, either now or when the committee arises.

Mr. GILLETT said:

The gentleman even will not let it be considered?

Mr. COX. No; not by unanimous consent.

I have a personal interest in opposing this unfortunate act of the Fuel Administrator. In the great manufacturing city in which I reside—Manchester, N. H.—there are 30,000 working people who have been put out of employment in cotton and boot and shoe industries, and thousands of them have been working on Government orders. The tremendously high cost of living makes this two weeks of unnecessary shut-down a great burden on these people, many of whom will suffer hardships thrust upon them by this act, and will have to make great sacrifices to make ends meet. I have much apprehension for their welfare, for their comfort, for their sustenance, and for the tremendous shrinkage in the manufacture in many necessaries so greatly needed in the trenches and cantonments by our soldier boys. With plenty of coal, our great Amoskeag Manufacturing Co., which makes 300 miles of cloth each day and employs 18,000 people, is now, I suppose, idle for five days, and the loss involved in the big wage it pays, amounting to about $50,000 daily, and 4,000 miles of cloth that would have been produced, much of it being khaki for the Army, will be a tremendous calamity both to the labor which would have been employed and to the Nation, which to-day so greatly needs its products.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe it is my duty as a Member of this House to support the Government in this great crisis. I believe the cause for which we fight is a just cause, and our aims are as unselfish and noble as any that ever enlisted the thought and energy of man. I know that our enemy is strong and resourceful and desperate. The plans and purposes that for 50 years he has been cunningly formulating he will not easily relinquish. The pursuit of a victory that he thought well within his grasp he will not willingly surrender. I know that in order to beat down in defeat this powerful antagonist we must fight, and continue to fight, with all our forces and all our resources of men, money, and material. I know that we who remain at home must be willing to give up many of the comforts and conveniences of life. We must be willing and glad to sacrifice more and more in order that liberty—the liberty that Washington fought to establish, the liberty that Lincoln died to save—may not perish from the earth.

And, Mr. Chairman, I know, too, that the people of this country are indeed willing and glad to sacrifice in this great cause. They are doing it now; they expect to do it in even greater measure in the days to come. They are sending their boys—the pride of their hearts—into the cold, the mud, and the water of the trenches, there to live or to die, as God shall will, with little but the rats to keep them company. They are giving of their substance to Red Cross funds and liberty loans and making no complaint. They are giving their time, their energy, their money, and their brains without recompense, promise, or hope of reward, in order to bring some sort of order out of the confusion and chaos that fell upon the departments of this Government when a war for which we were utterly unprepared, but which for more than two years had been steadily and surely approaching—as certain, as inevitable as a decree of fate—broke suddenly upon us. All this and more that passes the power of man to tell, the people of this country, all classes of them—rich and poor, the employer of labor and the man who works with his hands for his daily bread—are doing, and expect to do, willingly, gladly, joyfully, in order that a glorious victory may at length be ours.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I will yield at the end, but not now.

God pity the man in position of authority and trust who under such circumstances by any act or omission to act makes any heavier than necessary this burden of toil and sacrifice that the people of America have so willingly assumed. To-day thousands and hundreds of thousands of men and women throughout the whole territory east of the Mississippi River are unable to go to their daily work because of this order of the Fuel Administrator. And this condition is to continue for the next five days, and thereafter one day a week for 10 weeks. It means the loss of more than $200,000,000 in wages to those who in these days of high prices can least afford to bear it. It means the curtailment by $1,350,000,000 in value of material vitally necessary to the Government within the next two weeks. It means a substantial slowing down in our war preparations at a time when the whole world is calling upon us to put on full speed.

Why is it done? We are not told why it is done, except in the most indefinite and general language. Mr. Chairman, I submit the American people are entitled to know the facts upon which such action was thought to be necessary. I go further. I say that our people were entitled to know these facts before the action was taken. They were entitled to reasonable notice of the proposed action by the Fuel Administrator, together with a very definite statement of his reasons for taking it. They got neither the one nor the other. The order came with all the suddenness and force of a thunderbolt. It is a stunning and staggering blow to the great industrial interests and the army of industrial workers of America. Upon any facts thus far disclosed it is, in my judgment, an even greater blow to the whole war program of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, the managers of the great industries of my district, as well as the great body of the people of my district, are enthusiastically patriotic in their support of the Government in the prosecution of this war. All they ask is to be shown that sacrifice is necessary, and it will be made ungrudgingly and without complaint. But they are tired and sick of seeing the great business in which we are now engaged bungled and thrown into confusion by well-meaning men who know nothing about what they are trying to do. [Applause.]

As the Representative on this floor of a great industrial district, in which one-eightieth in value of all the manufactured product of this country is produced, I enter my protest here and now against this arbitrary and, so far as yet appears, futile and therefore unnecessary action. [Applause.] The order should be revoked by the President without further delay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma use some of his time?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There will be possibly only one more speech on this side, and maybe not that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to make a political speech, but I have a telegram which speaks for itself, and which, I think, will be plain enough for everybody to understand. It says:

BOSTON, MASS., January 17, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM S. GREENE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Undersigned committee was appointed at meeting of New England Transportation Conference, which included representatives of Boston Chamber of Commerce, Associated Industries of Massachusetts, New England Shoe & Leather Association, the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, Paper Manufacturers of New England and Boston Trade Association, Arkwright Club of New England, and Paint and Oil Club of New England, and other manufacturers. The conference recognizes serious shortage of fuel, but feels that order of National Fuel Administrator will work unnecessarily great harm to labor and industry. All the submarines in the world could not sink in the same length of time the amount of supplies which will be killed by it. If literally carried out, millions of dollars of unnecessary damage will be caused in interference with production and destruction of goods in process. Same result could better be obtained by stating percentage of fuel each industry must conserve and allowing that industry to make that conservation under regulation of New England fuel administrator in such manner as will do least injury to business and keep the greatest number of employees at work. We object to the five-day shutdown as a poor way to accomplish the object sought, and we especially object to shortness of the notice, which does not give industrial plants opportunity to rearrange their schedules. New England has in its fuel administrator a man who has made very careful and continuous study of the necessities of the occasion. We believe that Mr. James J. Storrow, of Boston, should be given great authority and latitude to determine how coal which must be saved in New England shall be saved.

Shortage of fuel in New England is largely due to intereference with water transportation. Under ordinary conditions 60 per cent of our coal is brought by water. We do not object to United States taking vessels absolutely required for war purposes, but some of the vessels could be spared, at least temporarily, to relieve the present situation. The more boats that haul coal to New England, the more cars and locomotives there will be free to haul coal to other parts of the country, and the more war goods New England and the other parts of the country will produce. We, like good soldiers, will obey the order and live up to its spirit until it is either modified or rescinded. We do, however, protest against the peremptory form of order and unnecessary hardship which it entails. Thousands of employees will lose an unnecessary amount in wages at a time when they can least afford it. We urge that the Federal Fuel Administrator inform the New England Administrator the amount of coal which must be saved in New England, and that it then be left to the New England Fuel Administrator to order that saving in such way as may seem to him wise.

(Signed) FREDERIC C. MCDUFFIE, Chairman,
WILLIAM R. CORDINGLEY,
HENRY I. HARRIMAN,
FREDERICK C. HOOD,
LOUIS K. LIGGETT,
FRED B. RICE,
Committee on New England Transportation Conference.

Now, I live in Fall River, Mass., the largest cotton manufacturing city in the United States, where there are 114 cotton mills. We have about 50,000 employees in the various industries in my city. The district which I have the honor to represent has been short of coal for a long time, although I began early last year and tried to force the sending of coal to New England by water, not encumbering the railroads, but by having the coal transported by water. The transportation facilities were abundant until the Government took possession of them and transferred the steam tugs and barges away. We had ample opportunity to get the coal.

I made a statement in the Boston statehouse in December last when the governor called the New England business men and congressional representatives together, to the effect that if the Government would take its hands off and let the business men of New England take care of themselves, they could furnish all the coal that would be necessary to keep the industrial plants running and the vast number of men and women could enjoy the benefit of permanent employment and war contracts could be completed. But we have been stopped from time to time by reason of the failure under Government regulations and the confusion arising from the inefficiency and lack of business training of those who issued drastic orders. [Applause.] While many of these men had training and experience in many lines of procedure, it was and is plainly apparent that they were not experts in the production of coal and in many respects were unfamiliar with the efficient methods of those who had spent most of their lives in the transportation of coal by water and rail. I do not like to appear critical. But this fuel proposition is a very serious one.

In addition to the city where I reside, the cities of Taunton and Attleboro and the towns of North Attleboro, Mansfield, and Norton are hives of industry, employing a vast number of people. Some of these should have been supplied by railroads, as all are located on railroads. But the needs of Boston and vicinity and the great clamor which this large center raised drew from these smaller communities the fuel for manufacturing and domestic uses which they should have received.

In Fall River, Mass., are 114 cotton mills, using 425,000 bales of cotton, producing 1,095,000,000 yards of cloth annually, having 126,000 horsepower, and using more than 360,000 tons of coal per annum. Add to these 40 other manufacturing establishments of various kinds and then taking into account the other manufacturing cities and towns in the district who, while they suffer a shortage of fuel and have silently submitted to their misfortunes, feel keenly their unfortunate situation.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROMJUE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it would seem to be popular with the eastern press and some of the Members of this House to criticize the order which has been made by the Fuel Administrator. At this time, when the United States of America is engaged in the greatest war that the world has ever seen, we can not afford to be popular unless we are also right.

As I said, we are engaged in the greatest war that the world has ever seen. Now, so far as I am concerned, I am not in possession of sufficient facts to say whether this order is a righteous and just one or not, and I am quite sure that the membership of this House have had their minds so attracted to so many important questions recently that you perhaps—and I say this with all due respect to you—are not thoroughly in possession of all the facts that are necessary to determine at this time the wisdom of or the unnecessary promulgation of the order.

Now, suppose that the American Army upon the European battle field need a conservation of this coal. What will you gentlemen say if the boys who are doing the fighting for our country need the conservation of this fuel for the purpose of getting supplies to them? What will you say, if that is the fact, in regard to whether or not we could afford to suspend some of the business operations of this country for even a few days?

Why, this is not the first time in the history of our Government when a few days' suspension of business has taken place. In the year 1912 you will recall that many business industries of our country were at a standstill for a time, and some time ago in the last session, when our Government was drafting the boys in this country, you did not hear anything like the protests, in fact, there was not one-half the protest, when you were taking the young men from the homes, and sometimes young men who were really needed in the factory, in the mines, and on the farms, that this order has occasioned.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. ROMJUE. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Is it not a fact that these very fellows who are now growling about it wanted to grab the young fellows in the draft, and now they are not willing to allow their business to be closed for a few days in order to get the fuel to those boys? [Applause.]

Mr. ROMJUE. The gentleman is right. After we had conscripted the Army of this country to do the fighting for us, then came the question of raising the revenue to carry on this war. Telegrams poured into Congress from some of these same business concerns asking that they not be taxed so much as it would, so they claimed, injure their business. Now, I hold that the capital and business of the country is and should be marshaled by the President of the United States and wielded as a means of successfully carrying on the war, just as he leads the man power of our Nation in the war.

As I have said before, I am not sure that this order is necessary. But I do say this: That if it has been promulgated and set in motion at the direction of President Wilson, then I say I do not believe he has authorized it without first satisfying himself as to its expediency and necessity.

I regret to hear some Members of this House try to inject politics into this war, and to such let me utter this warning: This is not a time to play politics or even to think of them, and the people of this country are only interested in seeing this war brought to a successful and speedy conclusion, and in that hope and desire they are right; and they are willing, as a rule, to make the necessary sacrifice, and no exception to that rule must be made in favor of a few because perchance it may work a temporary hardship on some particular business. Dollars and business in this war must not be given a higher value than the lives of our men. This order may be necessary and it may not be; I do not undertake to say, because all the facts are not before this body, but they are within the knowledge of the President and his administrative officer.

Some will have us believe that the manufacture of munitions and arms necessary for our soldiers are to be stopped by this order. I am quite sure this will not be done to any appreciable extent, if at all.

One thing we do know, and that is that we need more coal just now to run the ships and transports to carry food and ammunition to our boys in France. And to me it seems more important that our men in France get the munitions and fuel and food and clothing than that some man's business here at home be permitted to run every day. If the man at home or the man who carries the flag of our country in the battles abroad, one or the other, must be discommoded, I stand ready to and do favor giving the loyal support to the soldier. Some Members have with great zeal said that if any business is stopped, some one, for the few days, will be idle. That may be true. This, to my mind, is a veiled insult to the laborer of our country. The workingman in the mine, in the factory, in the shop, and on the farm in my district has been as patriotic and has done his duty in this war as fully as any other citizen anywhere, and he will continue to do it, and he has given evidence thereof which needs no comment.

And if President Wilson decides or determines that the necessities and best interest of our soldiers in foreign fields require the suspension of some business interests in this country in order that these men who are fighting for our country shall have a better supply of food, fuel, and clothing, you will find the average laboring man, whether he be on the farm, in the factory, in the shops, or in the mines, will be able and willing to make the necessary sacrifices to win this war. It is a very difficult matter for some people to yet realize that we are in a war, and the business man, who has preached loyalty and sacrifice up to the present time, may now well be reminded, if he belongs to that class, if he is kicking or knocking on the President as to whether it is necessary for him to make sacrifice in a business way, he should be willing and ready to do it without a murmur.

I predict that the order may, as conditions change, necessarily require some modification and eventually abandonment; but I believe the President has seen further into the present situation than those who have seen fit to criticize him on the floor of this House. Again let me admonish you that the business interests of the country must be willing to meet sacrifices on their part just the same as the man in the humble walks of life, just the same as the man upon the farm and in other ordinary work, and let me remind those of you who are planning and working overtime to get ready for a political campaign and try thereby to embarrass the administration that the people of this country have no time nor desire to think of or discuss politics, for this is a time of all times when there should be but one standard in this country, and that is to be a true and loyal American, working with a zeal to keep a united and harmonious people bent solely to bringing the war to a successful and speedy conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. ROMJUE. I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STERLING].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am prompted to say a word on this resolution because of a thought advanced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

He stated that possibly the Fuel Administrator had in mind, when the recent order closing industry was made, the fact that the railroads would then not be required to carry or transport finished products and materials from the establishments of industry throughout the country but could be utilized transporting other essential commodities. If that be true, then let the railroads of the country proceed to the movement of that great commodity, coal, so much demanded and needed by the people of this Nation for domestic use, by the industries of the country in the preparation for war, and in fact by our allied nations of the world.

There has been marked criticism of the coal producer throughout certain sections of the country, and that criticism is wholly unjustified. I represent a district in southwestern Pennsylvania, a portion of the great bituminous coal region of that section of the Nation. You may know how I feel now and how

I have felt for some time when the people of the city of Washington, and people throughout great sections of our country, were sorely in need of coal for domestic and manufacturing purposes, and yet in southwestern Pennsylvania and the congested railroad district of Pittsburgh there are 18,000 to 20,000 cars of coal and coke on the sidings of the railroads and have been there for some time unable to be moved, because of lack of railroad power and equipment, to different parts of the country where business distress and human suffering could be relieved.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. I doubt if this condition may be directly charged to the Fuel Administrator.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. The trouble, then, is not the shortage of fuel, as I understand. Why, then, the order suspending the use of fuel, if there is some in the country? Why is the order not issued to move it?

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. I am not fully advised as to the necessity that prompted the recent order on the part of the Fuel Administrator, and, fully realizing that it will work great hardship, I am not at this time prepared to defend its wisdom. In reply to that part of the gentleman's question as to why an order is not made to move the coal, I will say that it seems impossible to do so with the railroad power and equipment of the country taxed as never before by the tremendous business undertaking of the country.

The railroads of the country four years ago began an unusual, and I believe uncalled for, retrenchment in business affairs, curtailed and neglected power and equipment, and some very well-informed people say for political purpose against the party in power, and not only failed in this purpose but were caught wholly unprepared to meet the business conditions as they have arisen since that period of unnecessary retrenchment.

There has been much talk of politics this afternoon in connection with the affairs of our Government, and unfortunate at this time. I care not about the politics of any man at the head of any of the newly created commissions to deal with the war situation. He is here in Washington and not close to the people. If there is to be a game of political intrigue, the men down in the districts appointed by the heads of departments could better play it.

I submit to the gentlemen from western Pennsylvania on the other side of the House that there was appointed only two weeks ago, under this very department, a committee of five prominent coal and coke men of western Pennsylvania to stimulate and increase the production of coal and coke in that section of the State—three Republicans and two Democrats. And I say to you that they are all fair, honest, competent men, trying to do their duty to their country, trying to produce and supply coal to the people and industries of the Nation without thought of politics. [Applause.] I am not here, my friends, from a normally Democratic district of western Pennsylvania. I have been honored with the compliment of representing a district that disagrees in politics with the party to which I belong. [Applause.] But my best endeavor shall be to represent that district and all of its people. [Applause.]

It has been urged by some people, as noted in some papers, that the coal mines of the country should be taken over because the coal operators and coal and coke workers are not producing for the people and the country at this time.

Unjust assumption, without foundation of fact. Let me say to you and to the people of this Nation I know the coal operators and workers of the bituminous regions and of the country are a patriotic people.

They are ready—yes, willing—to work 16 hours per day, if necessary, to produce coal, if the railroad facilities are provided to transport the coal where needed. Many of the coal workers and coke drawers of many counties of southwestern Pennsylvania have been idle from two to three days per week for the past two months because of the railroad cars. The coke yards stocked with coke and no time to be gained at tipple mines without cars.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. From the district I represent the sons of coal operators, coal miners, and coke drawers—yes, miners themselves—are in the cantonments of this country. Also many of our boys are in Europe doing faithful service for our cause.

Our people know that coal and coke are necessary not only to relieve the suffering and want of the people but essential also for the successful operation of the mills and industrial establishments engaged in the manufacture of war munitions and equipment to support our men in arms.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield half a minute? I just want to ask one question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield a minute.

Mr. MEEKER. Is it not a fact that the present Fuel Administrator told the people of this country last summer not to buy coal then, that they would get it for less money?

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. I do not know what he told some of the people.

Mr. MEEKER. You do know that?

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. How would I know that if he did not tell me?

Mr. KNUTSON. It was published in the papers.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. You may depend upon this, however, that the people of the bituminous district will back up their sons, the young manhood of the country, with coal and coke. Give our people the railroad facilities, the coal and coke will then come. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL],

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if any evidence were needed to prove that what the country is suffering from is not a shortage of fuel supply and fuel-producing capacity in the country, but a breakdown of transportation, with the railroads absolutely under Federal control, the evidence was given us by the well-informed gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] who has just spoken. [Applause.] And yet in this condition of affairs, with the man power and the machinery power of the greatest coal-producing nation on the face of God's earth, greater than it ever was before in all its history, with capacity at the mines to produce all the coal that could possibly be consumed, with men anxious to load it, operators anxious to provide it, the Fuel Administration is closing down and paralyzing the industries of the country under the pretense that our coal supply is short and that we can not supply our industries with fuel.

To my mind the most regrettable thing about this order is the aid and comfort it will give to the enemy across the sea; for if a condition existed here which warranted the issuance of such an order, that condition would be extremely gratifying to the Kaiser and all his cohorts. In my humble opinion the issuance of this order will give more comfort to the public enemy than would a great victory on the battle lines of western France.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. I wonder if our friend Mr. Garfield—Dr. Garfield—is in some way being used as the goat, as the field of camouflage, in order to obscure and take from the minds and thought of the people the failures and faults of others? What is the trouble? The difficulty is in transportation and in transportation alone. The sidetracks of the Nation are filled with strings of cars of undelivered coal. A speeding up, a rearrangement of our transportation system so as to send those cars to their destination, compel their unloading, return them to the mines where the miners are waiting idle, anxious to reload them, would keep the industries of the country going and accelerate rather than check their development and progress. I know gentlemen on the other side will say we should not criticize because of loss to industries; we should, like good patriots, grin and bear it—and I think we should if that was all there was to it, if it were necessary. No constituent of mine is affected by this order. No one has appealed to me with regard to it, and therefore I think I am in a position to regard it solely from the standpoint of a citizen anxious to have the essential industries of the country operating helpfully in time of war and stress. The difficulty is that in a condition which is clearly and and confessedly unfortunate and regrettable in many respects, an order has been issued that under no possible circumstances or conditions can cure the situation and that will bring tremendous loss to industries and injury and suffering to millions of people through loss of employment. War industries are to be halted and disarranged, and the whole country paralyzed by the throwing of a monkey wrench into the machinery of the Nation because there is somewhere a valve out of order or a joint that needs a little lubrication. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman is largely right in his conclusion as to the real trouble—the question of transportation. But will he not be fair enough to admit that these railroads have for years been controlled and operated by business men undoubtedly as good as there are in the country? And if they have fallen down——

Mr. MONDELL. That is entirely beside the question.

Mr. HAMLIN. No; it is not beside the question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman yielded for a question, and I have not completed my question.

Mr. MONDELL. Let the gentleman complete his question and not make a speech.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then ought the Government, which has had control of these railroads only about two weeks, to be criticized for not undoing the very things that the best business men of the country could not prevent from happening after years of experience? [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. The order in question is not an order issued by the railway control.

Mr. HAMLIN. No; but the gentleman said that was the trouble.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not an order which on its face is intended to relieve the railway situation. The order is issued on the pretense and excuse that we need to save fuel, and under that pretense and excuse the industries of the country, including those working on war material, are being unnecessarily and mercilessly sacrificed, to the infinite loss and harm and suffering of all the people who are now employed in those industries. We on this side were glad to give to the administration every power, even to the utmost, believed to be necessary to win this war. We have withheld criticism of many things that we felt might properly be criticized. I shall continue that attitude so far as I can properly do so. I am disinclined to charge the President with any responsibility for this most extraordinary order. I can not believe that the President, a man of good judgment as he has so often proven himself to be, could have had the time and the opportunity to have carefully studied or considered the order which was approved by his subordinate. But we would be derelict to our duty as American citizens if we sat idly in our seats while orders so utterly without defense, of such doubtful legality, orders so absolutely revolutionary, harmful, and without promise of beneficial results, were launched upon the country.

It is our duty to protest against reckless, foolish, and harmful orders of governmental administrative bureaus just as much as it is our duty to furnish the power necessary to do things in a proper and in a sensible way. [Applause.] I imagine there are few sane and sensible men in the country uninfluenced by political motives that can find it in their hearts to justify this extraordinary order.

There are innumerable ways, patent to any man of ordinary sense and judgment, whereby the present condition of railway congestion could have been remedied. There could have been a shutdown of entirely unnecessary industries instead of shutting down industries preparing the very powder and shot necessary to protect the honor of the Nation on the other side of the sea. There are innumerable ways in which relief could have been secured; there could have been a temporary checking of fuel consumption in unnecessary industries; a closing of institutions which the people could, for the time being, just as well do without. Drastic action could have been taken to speed up freight movements. But instead of that comes this drastic, far-reaching order closing down even industries run by water power, industries that mine their own coal on their own ground and never send it a mile over a railway line, in liscriminate paralyzing of the industries of the Nation, including those on which we depend to win the war, because some hair-brained administrator long on power and short on wisdom deems it proper to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a few telegrams that I have received from leading manufacturers and citizens of Cleveland, Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain telegrams. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the RECORD should be cumbered up in that way, but if the gentleman asks for time to read them himself I will not object.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio four minutes.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read these telegrams in my time.

A MEMBER. Read them yourself.

Mr. GORDON. I rather the Clerk would read them, as my throat is sore.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, January 17, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM GORDON,
Washington, D. C.:

Proposed order of Fuel Administrator as reported in newspapers, if put into effect, would cause us tremendous loss in loss of production and disorganization of our working forces. From what we hear from our men this would cause great dissatisfaction among workingmen, making them susceptible to outside influence and making it very difficult to meet payments on present liberty bonds, and almost impossible to sell them future issues. The successful proceeding of war depends upon industries and their workmen, and they must not be crippled and disorganized.

WHITE MOTOR CO.,
WALTER C. WHITE.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, January 17, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM GORDON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We protest Dr. Garfield's fuel order as unnecessary and inviting more serious trouble.

GREAT WESTERN OIL CO.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, January 17, 1918.

Hon. Congressman GORDON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

A most depressing influence on the morale of the worker is the Fuel Administrator's action in ordering a shutdown of industrial activities for a period of five days. Only hurts the workingmen who are now, in most instances, only living from hand to mouth. Such an order should be rescinded at once by the Government.

W. J. MCSORLEY,
President Lathers' International Union.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, January 17, 1918.

Congressman WILLIAM GORDON,
Washington, D. C.:

Dr. Garfield's fuel order an outrage. Endeavor to have stopped.

THE WINDAU TOOL CO.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I can readily understand, Mr. Chairman, by the reading of the telegrams, why the reading of them by the gentleman from Ohio would have been difficult for his sore throat. [Laughter.] I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, this drastic order involves a useless waste which must be avoided at a time when the supply of coal is one of the chief objects of the order. All buildings are permitted to use enough coal to prevent destruction of plant by freezing. It is apparent to every man who has had any experience with heating that after the heat is brought to a specific temperature it requires very little additional to run the factory. If that additional fuel is not used, all that is used, from 60 to 25 per cent, will be a total loss, since it is necessary consumption, but just below that required to keep the industry going. In certain cases when the heat is produced by the use of exhaust steam, many of which are found in my own section of the country, the waste is positively indefensible and at this time totally inexcusable. In certain establishments, where shavings from the running of the industry is used, it is a saving to run the industry rather than to shut it down. No man accustomed to this problem would overlook the loss by allowing an establishment to close down. Like the stopping and starting of a heavy train when once it is in motion, it requires much less energy to continue than when it stops and starts.

The great loss to the laboring man at a time when he is least prepared to suffer it is a most serious item. It will not compare either with justice, common sense, or patriotism to say that the employer will or must pay these wages during the idle days as a patriotic duty. Neither confiscation nor governmental bankruptcy is compatible with our conception of duty. While the order attempts to use all industries alike and therefore orders all to close, these who have a supply of coal as well as those who have not, including water-power industries, and, on a parity of reasoning, those operated by gas and electricity. This feature can not be justified, since, if the public weal is the basis of this order, the lessening of the production at such a time when all the world is mobilized for that purpose will defeat our very ambitions to win the war at the least sacrifice. Production may have run beyond transportation, but the remedy is not to reduce production but to speed up transportation. The most pertinent facts brought out by the Senate investigations refer to production as well as distribution. The most startling statement of Dr. Garfield yet made is the decision to stop much-needed production in order that transportation can catch up.

Mr. Chairman, there are certain facts which I think no one can dispute. I want to enumerate two or three of them and then allow the membership of the House to draw conclusions. The first thing I think everybody will admit is that there is a lack of facilities in utilizing the resources of the country we now possess that goes directly to administration. We have the richest coal fields in the world and consequently the greatest supply. We have the greatest ability in business organization in the world. Our industrial capacity has been admitted in every country of the earth with which we have dealings. We have the highest type of labor and the best organization of labor of any country in the world—a fact not only admitted here, but known everywhere, as indicated by the hordes of European emigrants. I think everybody will admit that we have the greatest railway facilities of any country. With all of these things present, which I think all will admit, justifies our expectation of successful administration if proper authority is given. There is a suffering to come out of this unexpected order to take effect to-day that ought to have strong grounds of justification or else it ought to be bitterly condemned. We have these facilities. It is pertinent to ask what we now lack.

The reason given by the Fuel Administrator for this drastic order, and it is given in plain words, is that New York is so congested that the ships are at the wharves loaded and ready to sail with no coal to put in the bunkers.

Now, the membership of this House must recognize at once that if that statement is true there is but one explanation, and that is a lack of comprehension in the usage of our facilities for which the country will hold this Government responsible. [Applause.] The fault is not want of facilities, but lack of direction of them.

Clogging at the terminals ought to be avoided and would be avoided if there was business skill directing it. Empty bunkers and dead ships are not the result of want of coal but proper direction to see that priority shipments under Government direction will prevent the very situation complained of. The heart of this situation is administrative inefficiency. Empty cars standing on the side tracks throughout this Nation can be seen by anybody that travels on the railroad. Only yesterday I received a letter commenting on this condition of the tracks clogged with cars, both empty and loaded. The writer stated that forty-two 50-ton cars were standing on the side tracks in his little town, which, by the way, is about 35 miles from Columbus, and they had been there for two weeks. This train of empties can be seen in hundreds of places throughout the country. Why does that occur except that there is inefficiency in the management of the railway facilities that now are under the Government management? This same writer said there were five cars loaded with sugar and one with molasses standing on these tracks at the very moment the people could not procure any sugar. This is error in management.

I hold, and I think nobody can doubt it, that if the railway men whose knowledge of transportation comes from a lifetime of training in the world's best school, that of actual experience under great responsibility, could have been free of the incubus, free of the inhibitive legislation of the past quarter of a century, so that they could have used their facilities without limitation to secure the maximum transportation at the minimum loss of energy, this collapse of the roads would not have occurred; but it now has occurred under Government direction. It will serve no man or responsible party to attempt to lay this breakdown entirely upon the weather. Wise direction would have avoided being caught by such congestion. To avoid it was the purpose of our voting control.

I say to the membership of this House that the explanation of Dr. Garfield, estimable and able as he is, does not and can not but increase public condemnation. The country will see written over it in every paragraph, in large letters, the one single word, "Inefficiency." It is a striking example of incompetency to use the facilities as well as ability we have, and I say that it has gone far enough to demonstrate our duty to overlook nothing and to demand the fullest realization of our ability, even if it means to rid the Government of our friends it should be done in the interest of efficiency. This Congress has withheld no power from the Executive to proceed effectively. We must now demand that such palpable and intolerable blunders must be avoided else our country's future is not reassuring. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, an order has gone out from the Fuel Administrator appointed by the President of the United States to stop from employment for 14 days the working people of this country. It is because of them that I desire to raise my voice, and especially those whom I know can not be helped by this stoppage in western Pennsylvania, or anywhere at which may be iron and steel rolling mills and furnaces.

Every furnace that is used in the making of iron and steel in this country has to be kept up to a certain heat all the time. If not, it has to be brought up to that heat, which means using more coal than it otherwise would to keep it at the heat where it is in working condition. A furnace working iron and steel must be kept to 3,000 degrees Fahrenheit. If it falls below that it requires an immense amount of coal to bring it back to that heat. That is the reason these furnaces are worked continuously. There can not be any saving there under an order of this kind. Around Pittsburgh there is a daily pay roll of nearly $2,000,000 and at least $1,000,000 of that will be stopped for the space of 14 days—$14,000,000 in that time coming of the wages of the men who have to meet these high prices for living, who have to meet these enormous conditions of rent and generally adverse conditions presented upon all sides, and at the same time they are expected to buy war-savings stamps and liberty bonds and do everything they can to help the war, and they have been doing that. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this now—this is but simply a repetition of what always occurs every time the Democratic Party gets into power, somehow or some way.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and members of this committee, when I came into this House a few moments ago I did not expect to say anything, but I live in a city that has a greater number of diversified industries, barring two other cities, than any other city in the United States. The order closing 326 factories and numerous other places of business in that city is too serious to pass by unnoticed by me.

I live in a city where there has just been completed a contract by the American Brake Shoe Co. for the construction of $800,000 worth of homes to house munition workers; in a city where a contract has been let to a company for $63,000,000 for the erection of buildings and the making of cannon for the United States Government. That company has, in addition thereto, paid over $400,000 for land, and the purpose is to expend one and a half million dollars in the construction of homes for housing workmen. Even if these two munition plants come within some exemption clause, where is the material for the building of these homes to come from?

There are many other plants in my home city engaged in Government work, and these companies have been continuously urged to finish their contract.

I heard of the order with amazement, and I have received telegrams of protest concerning this order that has been issued by the Fuel Administrator.

I think the loss of wages alone for workingmen, who have all they can do to support their families, will not encourage them next February to buy liberty bonds, which the Government is going to ask them to do. I know of no greater tax that can be placed upon these workingmen than the loss of their wages. You may talk about conscription of wealth, but you have conscripted the flour barrel when you make these men idle. They will not have the means with which to show their patriotic ardor in the purchase of these liberty bonds. In my opinion the fault is largely due to the lack of proper administration of the railroads. I talked with a gentleman the other day, and he told me his brother had recently visited the State of Kentucky and saw 1,200 carloads of coal on the switches in that State that had been there for some time, and another gentleman from the same State told me that in his little city there had been 600 carloads of coal remaining there for days. I know that on the shores of Lake Erie there were for 30 or 40 days many carloads of coal standing there that could not be shipped. I know that this congestion of freight in the Pennsylvania terminals in New Jersey opposite New York is not a new matter. It has been in existence for months, and there has been a lack of proper appreciation of what should come first. Munitions and guns and other war material have been concentrated there, but there has been a failure in not putting coal behind them to get them across. The order should be at least modified or there will follow confusion and industrial paralysis. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE].

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent a district in which one of the largest industrial plants of the United States is located. The order of Fuel Administrator Garfield, as originally given out, will work a serious hardship to the people of the valley of the Conemaugh. It comes with peculiar and significant force at this time, for the reason that the Midvale Steel Co. is largely engaged in the making of munitions, has a great force of men in its employ, and to deprive them of the means of a livelihood for a period of 14 days——

Mr. MADDEN. Fifteen days.

Mr. ROSE. Well, one of them is about gone—will result in serious loss, and might bring some of our people to suffering and want. I have been much disturbed about the order in question, as it comes to us without warning of any kind, is not understood, and its effects are likely to be very far-reaching. Our people have shown their patriotism, our working people especially. They have met their quota with money and men, and it can not be said that they have been lacking in patriotism. Under the terms of the order of the Fuel Administrator, the Midvale Steel Co. will not be permitted to make use of the coal which it mines, the gas which it manufactures, and hence there will be a serious waste which should be avoided. I thoroughly agree with what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] has to say about furnaces and other appliances in and about the manufacture of steel, and his suggestions are well worth consideration. There may be good reasons for the issuance of the drastic order, but I very much regret that the appeal made to the Fuel Administrator did not result in having the same withheld until the people of the country could have been made acquainted with the facts, and if it were shown to be a necessity there is no doubt in my mind but that our people would have responded to the call with the same sort of support as has been given the administration in every effort made to win the present war. I sincerely hope that the order may be revoked or be modified in such manner as will bring about the least suffering upon the part of the workingman.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I have been too angry for the last few days to attempt to talk or listen. This House showed on last Wednesday when it refused to consider the bill dealing with unemployment insurance its utter incompetency to deal with this problem. Ignorance and darkness were equally distributed between the two sides. There were just as many reactionaries, standpatters, and unthinking men on the Republican side as on the Democratic side, so honors are even between both of you. When I talked to you about the necessity of now studying unemployment insurance I was met with the argument that we were at war, and therefore we could not get the proper information. Now, the information came to you; now, you have it. The order is here, an order which will deprive millions of men of employment for 15 days, millions of them with nothing to spare, who can not be called upon to make such a sacrifice, millions of them who can hardly stand the high cost of living. When I urged upon you the resolution providing for the study of the problem of unemployment many of you did not dare vote for it because it had been introduced by a Socialist. Forty-seven treacherous Democrats, too cowardly to vote for a Socialist measure when it had a chance to pass, who voted for it last year, refused to vote for it this year [applause on the Republican side], the most contemptible political performance that any party could be guilty of. [Applause on the Republican side.] I mean in the last Congress, when this thing came up. I just studied those 47 names, and I will memorize those names, and I will remember them. [Laughter.] I feel like throwing up my job in Congress and going to the districts of those 47 men and showing them up. Well—— [Cries of "Give it to them!"]

Well, we will some day give it to both of you, gentlemen. I will not be alone all the time.

A MEMBER. Give it to them first.

Now, let me come to the point——

Mr. FORDNEY. Is there a point?

Mr. LONDON. There is a point, although I can imagine what the gentleman as a protectionist will say, "Give us a protective tariff, for that will help us right now." Now, your remedy you learned 120 years ago, and you have not learned anything since. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] But you say you talk about Lincoln. The trouble is that Lincoln is dead and a lot of small politicians are alive. That is the trouble. [Laughter.] That applies with equal force to Democrats who glory in Jefferson. There is no doubt about the greatness of Jefferson. He would have been ready to have recognized the present needs of society, and which will not be recognized by you. If they were living at this hour, they would have taken up the social problem. They would have grasped its meaning for the world. You, you are incapable and incompetent of dealing with this problem. It will take bigger men than you are to tackle it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. One moment, please. Let me come to the practical suggestion. It is for the Socialist to bring forth a practical suggestion.

Mr. TREADWAY. Sure.

Mr. LONDON. Millions of men will lose 15 days of wages each——

Mr. KNUTSON. One hundred and five million days.

Mr. LONDON. It involves great loss. A study or investigation is not sufficient now. We must do something now, that all the sacrifices of this war should not be thrust upon the shoulders of those who are least capable of bearing the burden, and I ask that an appropriation of $100,000,000 be made, to be given to the Secretary of Labor, who should be directed and authorized to relieve unemployment, to relieve distress which will inevitably be caused by this order.

I do not care to criticize this order.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONDON. I have not the time.

Mr. MEEKER. I just wanted to know if it would not save time and money to remove the administrator?

Mr. LONDON. The trouble with you is you would remove the administrator and would not remove yourself. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Give me just five minutes more.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield one minute to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. I just wanted to round out my argument.

I have drafted a resolution, which I will introduce, asking for an appropriation to the Department of Labor, with instructions to the Secretary of Labor to take up a study of this emergency and to relieve the distress which will be caused by this order, or which has already been caused by it. This is the only thing that my mind could reach at the present moment. Of course, I can not claim it is the result of any profound thought, but it is an immediate step to meet the emergency. I suggest that this Congress vote the appropriation. [Applause.]

I submit a draft of the resolution which I expect to introduce to-morrow:

Joint resolution authorizing the appropriation of $100,000,000 to relieve distress among wageworkers.

Whereas the order to suspend the operation of factories for 14 days will cause unemployment and distress among the wageworkers and their families: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Labor be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to immediately adopt suitable measures to relieve such distress; and be it further

Resolved, That the sum of $100,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of Labor to carry out the purposes above stated.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, it probably is fitting that the sole representative of his party on the floor—the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON]—after sulking in his tent for two or three days, should have an opportunity to run amuck amongst us and voice his rage against majority rule. The gentleman is interested in a measure which bears his indorsement and his name, providing for an investigation of social insurance and unemployment, and calling for a large appropriation and the appointment of a commission, and which he has not yet said would do one single thing to help win this war. And yet the representative of his party here, who voted against the declaration of war, who has voted against many, if not all, the appropriations to properly conduct that war, who has voted against the bond issues to provide the money for meeting the expenses of conducting that war, comes before this House at this time, and because the measure carries his name would have the Congress pause in its deliberations on war measures and other important appropriation bills and give consideration to a measure that has nothing to do with furthering our interests or with promoting the success of our arms, but will add many thousands of dollars to the vast sums which the people are obliged to raise in this grave period of our history. He is unwilling to wait until we have concluded the greater task and to defer his desire for a solution of this program and of this problem and smother his wish to achieve personal glory, but prefers to put forward a personal measure in the hope of realizing, in the midst of this war, some of the dreams which he dreams and some of the schemes which he schemes [laughter], and because a majority voted not to do it he scolds and rages. He is anxious to substitute that sort of legislation for legislation that more properly should be engaging our attention in the face of a decided majority against considering the matter on a roll call.

I sympathize somewhat with the gentleman in his desire to terminate the careers of some of the majority party on that side of the Chamber, but I doubt if it will be necessary for the Socialist Member of this House to go into Democratic districts and campaign against any of the traitorous 47, as he terms them, in order that Republicans may replace them in the next Congress. But I say to the gentleman that I believe it is time that he awoke to the situation, and that he should cease by his example here in the House to lend encouragement to those who may be half-hearted in their loyalty to our flag, and that he should decide to henceforth stand by and support his Government and my Government and lend his voice and vote in support of the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy in conducting this war and make due announcement to that effect. This would be more worthy of the gentleman than gnashing his teeth or venting his rage because a majority of the House fails to agree with him. He might soothe his wounded feelings with the thought that peace will come some day and find solace in the reflection that he, or possibly some of his colleagues, or mayhap some who sympathize with his views or who even may be adherents of his political party, may be willing to then undertake this task of investigating social conditions and unemployment in this country, and that it will not then be too late for him to crown himself the champion of the downtrodden or to achieve the glory which he now seeks, which glory he apparently believes is above the glory and the destiny of his country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has consumed all his time.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and in full compensation for all offices and salaries which are provided for herein for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, namely:

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8696) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and had come to no resolution thereon.

AGRICULTURE IN PORTO RICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and, excluding the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Section 39 of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1917, entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," contains the following provision:

That the Governor of Porto Rico shall cause to have made and submitted to Congress at the session beginning the first Monday in December, 1917, a report of all the real estate used for the purposes of agriculture and held, either directly or indirectly, by corporations, partnerships, or individuals in holdings in excess of 500 acres.

In accordance with this provision, there is submitted herewith a report prepared under the direction of the Governor of Porto Rico.

As will be noted, this report covers all real estate used for the purposes of agriculture and held, either directly or indirectly, by corporations, partnerships, or individuals in holdings in excess of 500 acres.

Very respectfully,

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 18 January, 1918.

REPORT OF FUEL ADMINISTRATOR FOR 1917.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the provisions of section 21 of the act of August 10, 1917, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," I transmit herewith the annual report of the Fuel Administrator for the year 1917.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 18 January, 1918.

REPORT OF FOOD ADMINISTRATOR FOR 1917.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the provisions of section 21 of the act of August 10, 1917, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," I transmit the report of the United States Food Administration for the year 1917.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 18 January, 1918.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the provisions of section 6 of the act of October 6, 1917, entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," I transmit the report of the Alien Property Custodian of all proceedings had under said act during the year 1917 on the part of the Alien Property Custodian.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 18 January, 1918.

SESSION LAWS OF ALASKA FOR 1917.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Territories and, excluding the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the provisions of section 20 of the act of August 24, 1912, entitled "An act to create a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska, to confer legislative power thereon, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith the Session Laws of Alaska for 1917, containing the acts, resolutions, and memorials passed at the third regular session of the Territorial Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which convened at Juneau, the capital, on the 5th day of March, 1917, and adjourned the 3d day of May, 1917.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 18 January, 1918.

COAL AND ASPHALT DEPOSITS, CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask that there be laid before the House the bill (H. R. 195) providing for the sale of the coal and asphalt deposits in the segregated mineral land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Oklahoma, with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 195) providing for the sale of the coal and asphalt deposits in the segregated mineral land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I would like very much to have those amendments concurred in this evening, but several Members insist that the matter should go over until the morning as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. Very well.

"GARABED."

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that House joint resolution 174 be placed before the House, with the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 174) for the purpose of promoting efficiency, for the utilization of the resources and industries of the United States, for lessening the expenses of the war, and restoring the loss caused by the war by providing for the employment of a discovery or invention called the "Garabed," claiming to make possible the utilization of free energy.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH, Mr. CROSSER, and Mr. NOLAN.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT DAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, it is evident to me, after talking over the matter with members of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that it will be impossible to dispose of that bill (H. R. 8696) to-morrow. It will take at least to-morrow and Monday. Monday being unanimous-consent day. I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on next Monday be dispensed with and that the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill be in order on that day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the business in order next Monday be dispensed with and that the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill be continued then. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Reserving the right to object, does that dispense entirely with suspension motions on Monday?

Mr. KITCHIN. For that day, yes; but they would be in order on the next suspension day.

The SPEAKER. It undoubtedly would, unless we get through with the Indian bill at some time during the day.

Mr. FESS. Suppose we get through with the Indian bill before the end of the day?

Mr. KITCHIN. Then they would be in order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken in general debate may have the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD for five days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks that all Members who have spoken on the Indian appropriation bill be permitted to extend their remarks within five days. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman any objection to incorporating as a part of his request that this shall not include telegrams, letters, and documents?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I agree to that.

The SPEAKER. Adding to his request that it shall not include telegrams, letters, editorials, written communications, and so forth. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, do I understand that the extended remarks are to be confined to the bill?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7697. An act to authorize the calling into the service of the United States the militia and other locally created armed forces in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 19, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of inspection of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, its records, disbursements, management, and condition during the year 1917 (H. Doc. No. 836), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CLARK of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7223) to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Moultrie, in the State of Georgia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 244), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7235) to provide for the uniform selection and purchase of fuel to be used in the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 246), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) amending the act of July 2, 1909, governing the holding of civil-service examinations, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 245), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. KAHN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 979) for the promotion and retirement of Col. David L. Brainard, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 247), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7097) granting a pension to George Archambault; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 8242) granting an increase of pension to Andrea Coda; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, resolution of Pawtucket (R. I.) Chamber of Commerce, protesting against order of the Fuel Administrator in closing factories; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: Memorial of the New England Transportation Conference, representing Boston Chamber of Commerce, Associated Industries of Massachusetts, New England Shoe-Leather Association, the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, Paper Manufacturers of New England, Boston Wool-Trade Association, Arkwright Club of New England, Paint and Oil Club of New England, and other manufacturers, protesting against Fuel Administrator Garfield's peremptory order in shutting down industrial plants, and asking that the New England fuel administrator be instructed what percentage of fuel New England should save, and allowing him to select the means to effect this saving; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, a memorial of the Pawtucket Board of Trade, protesting against the fuel order; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, a telegram from the Bourne & Rubber Co., of Providence, R. I., protesting against the order of the coal director; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, a telegram from C. B. Rockwell, jr., objecting to Mr. Garfield or any other coal man as fuel administrator, and suggesting the appointment of a manufacturer or railroad man; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. PRATT: Memorial of reformatory officials of Elmira, N. Y., favoring S. 3063, to save the naval brig Niagara; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 19, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we bless Thee for the Sabbath day, with its quietude and rest, its religious reflections and spiritual uplift, which holds us close to Thee and enlarges our spiritual vision; for the everyday business activities of life, which bring us in contact with our fellow men, and test the nobility of our souls.

Grant, O most merciful Father, that we may love mercy, do justly, and walk humbly with Thee this day and all the days of our life, in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INCOME TAX PRIMER (H. DOC. NO. 841).

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 38,900 copies of a document prepared by the Treasury Department, in connection with the clerk of the Ways and Means Committee, be printed as a public document. It is a kind of primer in reference to the income and excess-profits tax. It will come within the $500 provision, and will give each Member 90 copies. I ask that they be distributed through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to print as a House document 38,900 copies of a document explaining the income and excess-profits tax, prepared by the Ways and Means Committee, and that it be distributed through the folding room. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBBINS. Reserving the right to object, what does it explain?

Mr. GARNER. It is in the form of questions and answers that are likely to be asked by people throughout the United States who will have to render a report of their incomes.

Mr. DOWELL. Reserving the right to object, how many does the gentleman wish printed?

Mr. GARNER. Under this arrangement it must be done by the House order, and it will give about 90 copies to each Member of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE RED CROSS.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Red Cross activities.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of Red Cross activities. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, are these the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. HICKS. The most of them, but I want to include some reports.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8696) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point that no quorum is present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered. The Doorkeeper was directed to lock the doors and the Sergeant at Arms to bring in absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anderson	Drukker	Kiess, Pa.	Saunders, Va.
Anthony	Eagle	Kreider	Scott, Pa.
Aswell	Edmonds	LaGuardia	Scully
Bacharach	Esch	Lenroot	Sells

Dempsey	Johnson, S. Dak.	Riordan	Winslow
Dewalt	Jones, Va.	Rowe	Woodyard
Dooling	Kahn	Rowland
Doremus	Kennedy, R. I.	Sanders, La.

The SPEAKER. On this vote 305 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. HOWARD rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. HOWARD. To submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for not to exceed five minutes for the purpose of reading a telegram and putting it into the RECORD and submitting some observations upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to address the House for not to exceed five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, on what subject does the gentleman desire to address the House?

Mr. HOWARD. On this fuel situation, which is very critical in my section of the country.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the gentleman from Georgia, and I would like to be able to grant his request, but I fear that if the gentleman from Georgia is given permission many others will ask for the same privilege. We have already had two days devoted to discussion of this matter. There is a demand over here for more time——

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that there were so many gentlemen who found they were literally ruined and who were anxious to speak about it that, in deference to them, I allowed them to prove to the world that they were ruined, and I want now to submit a few observations on a telegram which I think the gentleman will be very glad to have go into the RECORD.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am very sure that I would, but——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If there are no other requests, I have no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I would like the opportunity of addressing the House for five minutes, if the gentleman from Georgia is granted that privilege.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no objection.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I object to going into a further discussion of this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8696) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SURVEYING AND ALLOTTING INDIAN RESERVATIONS (REIMBURSABLE).

For the survey, resurvey, classification, and allotment of lands in severalty under the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat. L., 388), entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians," and under any other act or acts providing for the survey or allotment of Indian lands, $100,000, to be repaid proportionally out of any Indian moneys held in trust or otherwise by the United States and available by law for such reimbursable purposes and to remain available until expended: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used for the survey, resurvey, classification, or allotment of any land in severalty on the public domain to any Indian, whether of the Navajo or other tribes, within the State of New Mexico and the State of Arizona, who was not residing upon the public domain prior to June 30, 1914.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GREEN of Iowa moves to strike out the paragraph beginning on line 1, page 2, and ending with line 19.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of this paragraph or even of this bill itself at this time is like fiddling when Rome is burning. The item contained in this paragraph may have been ordinarily of some importance, but compared with what is occurring now and which ought to engage the attention of the House at this time, it is puerile and trifling in the extreme. We are undertaking to appropriate $100,000 for some survey or other, which a few Members of the House know something about, when there are millions of men being thrown out of employment and when thousands are actually suffering for the want of the wages which they ought to receive at this time, all by reason of an order which is arbitrary in the extreme and wholly unnecessary——

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Iowa is not addressing himself to his amendment. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will permit me, in making this point of order, that these gentlemen might as well understand now that they will have to confine themselves to a discussion of their amendments all during this day upon this Indian appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that the gentleman from Iowa is not discussing his amendment. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Iowa that he proceed in order.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa was not referring to this paragraph, but was talking about the order of the Fuel Administrator——

The CHAIRMAN. The attention of the Chair was diverted for a moment, and he did not exactly hear the gentleman from Iowa. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Chair will pay strict attention to him, because I am going to interpose another point of order in a moment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, when the gentlemen who are so apprehensive and fearful that this subject may be further discussed interrupted me I was endeavoring to state how extremely unimportant this item of $100,000 for the survey and allotment of Indian lands is at a time like this. It ought not to be taking our time when the whole country is suffering under the blight of an order made by the Fuel Administrator——

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The gentleman from Iowa is making an argument against this appropriation, if the Chair understands him, on the ground that this money should be used for some other purpose. It occurs to the Chair that the gentleman has a right under the rules governing the committee and the House to argue why any appropriation should not be made. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this money ought to be used for the relief of those who are suffering by reason of the order which inflicts greater calamities than all the great fires of the last half century combined. I have examined the reasons which have recently been given by the Fuel Administrator for the issuance of this order.

I find that instead of being reasons why it should be made they are reasons which show why it ought not to be made under the circumstances. They demonstrate beyond question that the order is entirely unnecessary, and that instead of saving coal it will cause it to be wasted.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not now. I fear the gentlemen on the other side will not give me additional time. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. I will give the gentleman time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the reasons given by the Controller of Fuel for the issuance of this order are that the terminals are clogged with cars; that fuel is needed to supply ships and for the people. Is there anyone who expects that fuel will be taken out of the bins of the factories and put in the bunkers of the ships or hauled to houses? Will anyone say that, in order to keep factory goods off the railway tracks, that it is necessary to close the factories? There are thousands upon thousands of loaded cars of coal now on the tracks because stopped by Government priority orders.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GLASS. That the gentleman is not discussing the appropriation of this $100,000, but he is discussing the wisdom or the unwisdom of an order issued by the Fuel Administrator, and it is a subterfuge to discuss that sort of thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Iowa, up to the point where the gentleman from Georgia made the point of order, was discussing the advisability of making this appropriation. Since that time he has been discussing the wisdom of issuing the order. The gentleman——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the Chair will pardon me, I was comparing the reasons that might be given for the consideration of this particular paragraph with the reasons given for the issuance of the fuel order as showing that one was as futile as the other.

The CHAIRMAN. Fortunately at this instant, the time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

IRRIGATION ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS (REIMBURSABLE).

For the construction, repair, and maintenance of irrigation systems, and for purchase or rental of irrigation tools and appliances, water rights, ditches, and lands necessary for irrigation purposes for Indian reservations and allotments; for operation of irrigation systems or appurtenances thereto, when no other funds are applicable or available for the purpose; for drainage and protection of irrigable lands from damage by floods or loss of water rights, upon the Indian irrigation projects named below:

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Georgia and others need not be alarmed that I will transgress the rules in trying to discuss other matters than that relating to the paragraph under consideration. There has been considerable change of phraseology in the item under consideration from that which has been carried in prior bills. I have not been able to determine whether it is of any substantial import or whether it is just merely of a minor character.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The difference between this paragraph and the general irrigation paragraph usually carried in the Indian appropriation bill is that the paragraph carried in the past was a lump-sum allowance and this makes a specific appropriation for each irrigation district and project. This we thought a very good thing to do and which gives Members of Congress more information upon which they can legislate intelligently.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has not the phraseology of the authorization been changed in some particulars? Not only do you segregate the amounts that may be utilized for respective projects, but you have changed the phraseology in the authorization clause. I rise to inquire whether that broadens the authority in the bill heretofore existing or whether it limits it?

Mr. HAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman there is no material change in the phraseology and this item does not broaden the authority heretofore granted. But if the gentleman will look carefully at the entire matter, beginning with line 22, page 2, and extending to line 16, page 5, he will find that everything which was contained in the former authorization is properly cared for. The sole purpose of this change was to make specific appropriation for various Indian irrigation projects as estimated for by the Indian Bureau rather than to make a lump-sum appropriation to be expended anywhere, for which no report need be made to Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. For instance, I find in last year's act the language was, "For lands necessary for canals, pipe lines, and reservoirs." I do not find that language in the new paragraph. The language now is rather broadened, "lands necessary for irrigation purposes."

Mr. HAYDEN. That change was made at the request of the Indian Service and was thought advisable, because there is no use itemizing the various things to be done on an Indian irrigation system.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I ask whether this phraseology is as recommended by the Indian Service?

Mr. HAYDEN. Specifically recommended by them.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee the general question, in view of the fact he has not explained the bill and it might save us some time in considering other portions of the bill, whether there have been any items included in this bill for appropriations greater or appropriations not recommended by the department?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Any appropriation?

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether there are any items——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There are——

Mr. STAFFORD. The report of the gentleman on this bill does not indicate what those items are.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I had thought that one of the Wyoming projects had not been recommended, but I find from the hearings it was.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not asking now as to the irrigation projects, but whether throughout the bill there is anything included that was not recommended by the department?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There might have been some small item, like a bridge, included which was not in the estimate, but there is nothing in the bill that was not recommended either in the estimates or thereafter.

Mr. STAFFORD. As to the amount of the appropriations, are there any instances where the appropriation carried in the bill exceeds the recommendation of the department?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The bill is cut by something over $1,000,000, as stated in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. As the reports indicate, I am pretty sure the committee did not exceed the department's estimates in any item.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SINNOTT. I would like to ask from which fund these moneys are spent. Are any of them spent from the reclamation fund?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no expenditure in the bill from the reclamation fund.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No. There is no expenditure in the bill from the reclamation fund. And in every case, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, where a change from the estimate was made, there was a reduction.

Mr. STAFFORD. Most of these appropriations that have been segregated here, I assume, will be paid out of the trust funds of the Indians?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. To what does the gentleman refer—the irrigation item?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; they are reimbursed out of the trust funds of the Indians. And I understand that in a very few cases the money is refunded by the Indian himself by production from his allotment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In looking over these items as arranged in the bill—and I wish to congratulate the gentleman and his committee for having adopted this method of enumeration—I find that most of the amounts designated are very small. Is it the purpose of the committee to have the maintenance of these many projects worked on?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Most of them are for maintenance.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. To keep them in order and to keep them going? It is not intended that there will be a large period of construction?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. As the gentleman from Minnesota knows, most of the irrigation projects, the construction of them, is provided for separately in different items of the bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs undertook to make a good-natured, but it seemed to me a rather half-hearted, defense of this recent coal order, incidentally praising the nonpartisan attitude of the administration. I did not at that time have an opportunity——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is to strike out the last word.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that in the discussion of Indian questions partisanship may well be considered. This bill relates to Indians, and it is a well-known fact that Indian chiefs are intensely partisan, always surrounding themselves with members of their own party, and that they never appoint to office others than those who have supported them for the office of chief. [Laughter.] Furthermore it is conceded that in war time Indian chiefs crown themselves with feathers, and it is competent, I submit, to show that some of those surrounding the present chief are as light as feathers.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is discussing neither the amendment nor the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair submits to the gentleman from Ohio in good faith that he is not discussing the amendment before the House to strike out the last word.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the Chair sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must do so. The gentleman must admit that he is not discussing the amendment before the House to strike out the last word.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I still think, with great respect to the Chair, that I am in order in discussing a bill dealing with Indian affairs; but I submit, of course, to the ruling of the Chair, he being one of our most expert parliamentarians.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Irrigation district 5: Southern Ute, Pine River project, $9,000; San Juan Reservation, $22,000; New Mexico Pueblos, $12,000; Zuni Reservation, $5,000; Navajo, miscellaneous projects, including Tes-nos-pos, Moencopi Wash, Capt. Tom Wash, and Red Lake, $20,000; total, $68,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the paragraph, on line 19, by inserting the word "Reservation" after the words "Southern Ute."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAYDEN: Page 3, line 19, after the word "Ute" insert the word "Reservation."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

One assistant chief irrigation engineer, $2,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment just read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin reserve the point of order or make the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the point of order on the item just read. I wish to inquire of the committee what, in fact, has been done as to the salaries of these officials that are now described under new terms, and whether there has been any increase in salaries or whether there is going to be any increase of officials. I notice in the reading of last year's act we did provide for "one assistant inspector of irrigation who shall be a skilled irrigation engineer, $2,500." And in addition thereto the following:

For traveling and incidental expenses of two inspectors of irrigation, including sleeping car fare and a per diem of $3 in lieu of subsistence when actually employed on duty in the field and away from designated headquarters, $3,200.

This item here of $2,500, I assume, refers to the official who was carried in last year's bill under a different designation?

Mr. HAYDEN. We changed the designation at the request of the Indian Service.

Mr. STAFFORD. While I am on the floor I would like to have an explanation of the creation, if they are new places, of the two officials provided in the next two items, namely:

One supervising engineer competent to pass upon water rights, $2,500; One field cost accountant, $2,250.

Mr. HAYDEN. Those positions were provided for at the same salaries in last year's bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where were they provided for in the last year's bill? I do not find them anywhere in last year's bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. In the last proviso of the section, which reads:

That not to exceed seven superintendents of irrigation, six of whom shall be skilled irrigation engineers and competent to pass upon water rights, and one field-cost accountant, may be employed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is that which the gentleman has just read?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is at the end of this same section in last year's bill. The last proviso in the section.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no limitation as to the salary to be paid them.

Mr. HAYDEN. As a matter of fact, we ascertained that one supervising engineer was paid $2,500, and the field-cost accountant $2,250, and we allowed them the same salary that they were heretofore receiving. Instead of providing at this place in the bill for six superintendents of irrigation, you will notice that on page 3, lines 25, 26, and 27, we have included the salaries of the five supervising engineers of the five irrigation districts in the amounts appropriated for irrigation districts Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, at the top of page 4.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does that contemplate the employment of an unlimited number of supervising engineers?

Mr. HAYDEN. No, sir. As a matter of fact, we have made a reduction of one engineer heretofore authorized. We learned that he had not been employed, and so the committee authorized but five supervising engineers, one in each of the districts.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no such limitation in the bill as to the number. Under this phraseology the department could authorize the employment of as many as it saw fit, to the extent of the appropriation, whereas in last year's bill there was a distinct limitation on the number, but not on the salary.

Mr. HAYDEN. We made no limitation upon the salaries, because we appropriated such small amounts in each one of the irrigation districts that we knew they could not increase the salaries.

Mr. STAFFORD. You have not made any limitation on the salaries; neither have you made any limitation on the number.

Does not the gentleman believe that there should be some limitation on the number?

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman has an amendment to that effect, I would favor its adoption.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I notice that, on page 4, beginning on line 18, there is a provision for pay of one chief irrigation engineer at $4,000, and one assistant chief irrigation engineer at $2,500, and one supervising engineer competent to pass upon water rights at $2,500, and one field-cost accountant at $2,250.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am now directing the attention of the gentleman to the general language as found in the last paragraph on page 3, which provides for the skilled irrigation engineers which were provided for in last year's bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think we can cure that by moving to insert the word "five," after the word "of," in line 27, page 3.

Mr. STAFFORD. It should be "not to exceed five."

Mr. HAYDEN. Insert the words "not to exceed five."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arizona ask unanimous consent to return to page 3 for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to return to page 3 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. I move to amend, in line 27, page 3, after the word "of." by inserting the words "not to exceed five."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 27, page 3, after the word "of," by inserting the words "not to exceed five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws the reservation of the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And for traveling and incidental expenses of officials and employees of the Indian irrigation service, including sleeping-car fare, and a per diem not exceeding $3.50 in lieu of subsistence when actually employed in the field and away from designated headquarters, $6,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice throughout the bill that the committee has recommended an increase of the per diem from $3 to $3.50.

Mr. HAYDEN. We have done that in certain cases; but in one case, where Indian Office inspectors are now allowed a per diem allowance of $4 a day, we have reduced it to $3.50, so as to make the amounts uniform throughout the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I presume it is to be the policy, if this is allowed to go through, that this amount will be insisted upon in case it should be raised by another body?

Mr. HAYDEN. There should be at least an increase of 50 cents a day.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is the first instance, according to my recollection, of a change in the per diem allowance. Has an allowance of $4 been made to inspectors in the Post Office Service who have been receiving $3?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I can give you no precise information on that, but I think they get only $3.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know they have carried that amount in prior bills. I ask the gentleman or any member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads who is present whether that amount was changed in the Post Office bill that recently passed the House?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I can not give the gentleman that information.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I will say the amount was not changed. The allowance is still $3 a day.

Mr. HAYDEN. We found that in the Department of Justice $4 was allowed and in all the branches of the Interior Department, except the Indian Office, inspectors were allowed a per diem of $4, and that six Indian inspectors were allowed $4. In considering the estimates throughout the bill where $3 was formerly fixed we have allowed $3.50, an increase of 50 cents where the per diem has been $3, and we reduced the six inspectors from $4 to $3.50.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it to be the policy of the committee that that shall be the amount when this bill goes into conference?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The committee tried to fix this amount so that it would be equitable and uniform, and the committee has committed itself in favor of $3.50. As has been stated by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], in some of the departments inspectors drew $3 and in some $4, and in this very bureau some drew $3 and some $4, so that we thought we had hit upon a happy compromise when we made it $3.50. Speaking for one member of the committee, if I should be on the conference I would say that I would be quite obstinate against changing that amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire, in that particular, whether these employees and officials receive a per diem allowance for every day of the year or every workday or only when they are in the field performing service?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They receive it when they are in the field performing service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Attention was called to the fact some years ago that the Post Office Department granted that allowance for virtually every workday of the year; and as it was then considered, before living expenses mounted so high, as a real increase of compensation, the committee reduced the allowance from $4 a day to $3 a day.

I am making this inquiry at some length also because the Subcommittee on Appropriations, in framing the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, has this very question before it for determination. For instance, pension agents in the field examining claims arising from pensions, with salaries averaging from $1,200 to $1,400, receive under the appropriation bill an allowance of but $3 a day. We have before us a recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions to increase that to $4. I wanted to ascertain before it was too late just what was the policy of the Committee on Indian Affairs and what it was going to be if this amount of $3.50 was agreed upon?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have already stated what my position would be, and I think that is the position of the committee. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that, so far as this particular item is concerned, the language of it specifies a per diem not exceeding $3.50 in lieu of subsistence when actually employed in the field and away from designated headquarters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. That same objection presented itself in connection with the Postal Service. We found that inspectors would have designated headquarters, and that they would find it to their financial advantage to take a little side trip every day of an hour or two, or maybe a little bit more, in order to be away from their designated headquarters, so as to get their per diem allowance, and then return to their office to perform office work. It was an abuse, and, of course, in some instances you could not criticize them, but in many instances the practice was censurable.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, for irrigation on Indian reservations, $250,750, reimbursable as provided in the act of August 1, 1914, and to remain available until expended: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended on any irrigation system or reclamation project for which public funds are or may be otherwise available under any other act of Congress: Provided further, That the foregoing amounts appropriated for such purposes shall be available interchangeably in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior for the necessary expenditures for damage by floods and other unforeseen exigencies: Provided, however, That the amounts so interchanged shall not exceed in the aggregate 10 per cent of all the amounts so appropriated.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point or order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I believe this is new language that has not heretofore been carried in the Indian appropriation act, as to the interchangeability of these amounts for flood purposes and the like. Under the old phraseology the full amount that was appropriated was utilizable for flood purposes?

Mr. HAYDEN. Anywhere, at any time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, as I understand it, you seek to allow any of these items to be used interchangeably in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior for expenditures occasioned by damage by flood or other unforeseen exigencies, but that can not exceed 10 per cent of the amount so appropriated?

Mr. HAYDEN. That language is copied directly from the Agricultural appropriation bill with respect to the appropriations for the national forests, where emergency expenditures may be necessary because of forest fires.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman, who is very well acquainted with the expenditures under these various irrigation projects, give us the benefit of his knowledge as to how much money is expended on the average for flood purposes or other exigent emergencies?

Mr. HAYDEN. To tell the gentleman the truth, heretofore we have been making this lump-sum appropriation, which was used on the various irrigation projects as the Indian Bureau saw fit, without making any report to Congress. In past years there was no way of telling how much was expended for flood protection or for any other purpose. The object in making these itemized appropriations in this bill was to compel the Indian Bureau to report to Congress just how much was spent on each project and the amount used interchangeably in case of damage by flood or otherwise. Of course it is utterly impossible to foresee what the damage to Indian irrigation projects throughout the United States by floods will be, because floods occur when they occur. That can not be foretold. It would be impossible to give the gentleman that information.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to compliment the committee on their action in segregating these various amounts. Some committees have been rather averse to taking away from the department the control of lump-sum appropriations; but the gentleman from Arizona cites how impossible it is for any appropriating committee to follow the expenditures unless the items are segregated, as the committee has done in this instance. It should be done more generally by other appropriating committees if the Congress is going to keep control of the appropriations, as is its province.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] have both indicated their desire to offer amendments. Of course it is the custom to recognize a member of the committee first to offer amendments to perfect the text. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] did not happen to be on his feet and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] was on his feet. If the gentleman from Missouri will permit, the Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HAYDEN: Page 5, lines 8 and 9, after the word "available," strike out the words "under any other act of Congress."

Mr. HAYDEN. We considered those words to be mere surplusage, because if any part of this appropriation can be expended on any irrigation system or reclamation project for which public funds are or may be otherwise available it is unnecessary to say "under any other act of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. I offer an amendment to follow line 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BORLAND: After line 15, on page 5, insert: "No part of any amount herein appropriated shall be used to pay salaries or for personal services in any department, bureau, or office in the District of Columbia which does not, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved March 15, 1898, require eight hours of labor each day."

Mr. HAYDEN. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I reserve a point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. We might as well dispose of the point of order, if the gentleman will make it. The amendment is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It is evidently an attempt to change the present law with reference to the hours of employees.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a limitation on the appropriation.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The Chair has a right to rule that way, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is perfectly willing to hear the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, no amendment can be offered, even in the form of a limitation, which changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma has not pointed out where it changes existing law, but if it does change existing law the Chair will hear him. It occurs to the Chair—and the parliamentary clerk so advises me—that this precise question has been ruled upon several times and held that it comes within the Holman rule, that it is retrenchment of expenditures. Therefore, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this bill is not intended to carry any employees in the executive offices in the District of Columbia, but it seems by accident that it does carry a few, and I think one exception is the Irrigation Service. But this principle of requiring the departments to conduct their business upon an honest eight-hour day basis must, of course, be appended to each one of these appropriation bills, and therefore, although it may affect this bill to a limited extent, it is proper to offer it here.

Gentlemen of the House are familiar with the fact that in the Department of the Interior a seven-hour day prevails. It has prevailed for some time. It is an old abuse. It is one of those old abuses which seems impossible to eradicate in this District. It prevails in the Department of the Interior very generally. At this particular time the business men, taxpayers, farmers, and producers of the country are asking themselves the question, What is being done with all the money that is being raised from the people by taxation? Are we really getting efficient results out of it? That is the one paramount thought in the minds of the people to-day. Are we really pushing this war; are we really speeding up the preparations for the defense of democracy? If we are not, we are subject to great censure. We have agents out all over the country attempting to find clerical employees for the departments in Washington. In their efforts to find clerical employees by the thousands they have gone into the great commercial centers of the country and offered inducements to skilled employees now engaged in the work of the country who are rendering very essential, valuable, and important service in producing the wealth of the country that must pay taxes to support the Government.

I have no objection to taking away a certain number of these men for the service of the Government in Washington any more than I have to the taking away of a certain number for the service in the Army or in the field; if the Government needs the service, that claim is paramount. But I have serious objections to taking a large number out of the productive life of the Nation and bringing them to Washington to work a short seven-hour day. That kind of a day does not prevail in the commercial and industrial life of the Nation. There is an honest standard day of eight hours that organized labor and all other right-thinking people have agreed upon, except in exceptional cases, and that eight-hour day ought to prevail, and does prevail, in most of the Government activities outside of the city of Washington.

Now, here is a department still running but seven hours a day. It is manifest that under the circumstances that department is underworked and overmanned. By the very showing that it makes itself it is underworked and overmanned. If it can do the work in seven hours in 237 working days out of 365, it is manifest that it is not working at its full capacity.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. For a question.

Mr. JUUL. Does the Indian Department work its employees only seven hours in field work?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I think the Indian Department in its field work does not confine itself to seven hours, but I am not advised about that. I know that in the Postal Department they work eight hours and sometimes longer, and so in most of the great departments outside of the District of Columbia they work on an eight-hour basis. I know that the mechanics at the navy yard work eight hours, and I think pretty nearly all the mechanic employees under the Government work eight hours and are willing to do so.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Could not the gentleman from Missouri accomplish his purpose by directing his thrusts at the Cabinet officers under whose direction these employees work seven hours instead of eight?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is wrong in two points. "The gentleman from Missouri" is not directing any thrust.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It seems to me the matter could be accomplished by reaching the men under whose supervision these employees work.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me ask the gentleman who is suggesting a method to sidestep this proposition, is he in favor of the taxpayers getting eight hours a day from Government employees?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Kansas can answer or refuse to answer.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not demagoging on any question on this floor.

Mr. BORLAND. No; but the gentleman is demagoging if he fails to answer the question whether he is on the side of the taxpayer or the special interests of Washington.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not willing to waste the time of the taxpayers on the floor of this House.

Mr. BORLAND. I never have heard the gentleman waste any time on the taxpayers' side in any proposition, but I have seen him waste time on the side of the business interests of Washington. This is a matter between the business interests of Washington and the taxpayers of the Nation. The gentleman could line up on one side or the other of that proposition. The clerks, many of them, would be glad, of course, for a short day. That is human nature. But the clerks are honest and self-respecting enough to obey the law if Congress makes it. If Congress says that eight hours is a fair day, the clerks will obey the law. Who is making the trouble? It is the merchants and landlords of Washington. They are the ones who want an excessive number of employees, and they want them to be paid high wages for short-time work.

That is what this propaganda is backed by. I now send to the Clerk's desk to have read in my time an editorial from the Kansas City Star, which shows where the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and others stand on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON'S STRANGLE HOLD.

With becoming diffidence may it be suggested from the safe distance of Kansas City that it is hardly becoming in war time for the Government to permit its clerks to work only seven hours a day with a 30-day vacation?

This mild protest is put forth with diffidence because the Star recalls the tremendous wrath which Representative BORLAND called down on his head last year when he proposed in Congress that the clerks might work eight hours a day. To an outsider it would seem a mere commonsense proposal and not one to get excited about. But Washington could not have been more stirred if the cruel Mr. BORLAND had proposed to deprive it of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

His mail was flooded with indignant letters. The local newspapers denounced him. Ministers preached sermons against him and his monstrous proposals. At receptions Washington women would reproach him for trying to ruin the city.

The clerks were not the chief source of the agitation. They would have changed to the eight-hour day with some grumbling, but still without violence. The real trouble arose from the real estate men, merchants, and bankers. For it is self-evident that the shorter time the clerks work the more clerks there must be to do the work, and the more clerks the more families to house, the more grocery bills to be paid, and the better business for banks.

Washington business men did not propose to permit the Nation to save money through efficiency when they had a financial interest in waste. They were able to control Congress and Mr. BORLAND'S hated scheme for economy was at once sat on.

It is with due respect for the power of the Washington merchants over this Government that the Star modestly ventures to ask whether they won't release their strangle hold on Uncle Sam in war time and permit the Nation to work its employees in Washington as many hours as they work in Kansas City.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, we are trying to get Government clerks to carry on the business of this Nation. They are said to be necessary in all of these departments. Here is the Interior Department, the Department of Commerce, and the Department of Labor, all of them working seven hours a day. Those clerks working in those departments have not been asked to make any sacrifice for the Nation at war. Every other man in the land has been asked to make a sacrifice, even up to his own life or the life of his son. Those men have not been asked to sacrifice a single hour of extra work that we may win this war for democracy. If we need more employees to speed up preparation for war, let Congress have the courage to say that the Department of the Interior shall be put upon an honest eight-hour basis, and the surplus clerks now there be used for the purpose of speeding up preparation for the war.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the law now provides for an eight-hour day for Government employees. If that law is not enforced, the blame rests with the Executive. Congress is not the Executive. The law that already has been enacted should be enforced. It is up to the Secretary of the Interior to enforce the law against the employees who work seven hours a day instead of eight, upon whose service this amendment is hung by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. The gentleman from Missouri could get his campaign stuff as well circulated throughout the United States by attacks on the administration as he does by making cheap speeches on the floor of the House, and the work here would progress more rapidly, and we would get eight hours a day out of employees under existing law. If the gentleman from Missouri is interested in having the employees work eight hours a day, he will attack the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and all of the other executive heads of departments. They are the men under whom these employees render their services, and if these employees work less than eight hours a day, the blame lies with the heads of departments and not with the Congress, and it is a waste of treasure and of the time of this Congress to stand here and talk about repeating a law in every appropriation bill that already exists upon the statute books. Let the Kansas City Star and all of the other papers attack the President for keeping Members in his Cabinet who retain men and women who work less than seven hours a day, when the law requires that they shall work eight hours a day. There is also the remedy of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. If he had the courage to attack the administration or the Cabinet retained by the President, he would reach the matter that he has so long sought to impress upon the country. His devotion to the taxpayers reaches only far enough to make a few harmless speeches on the floor of the House of Representatives, but when it comes to the courage of attacking where attack will bring results, he is as silent as the tomb.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I am a partisan Republican, and it distresses me as a representative of my party to see the able and distinguished Member from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], in season and out of season, taking a position upon these appropriation bills which, to say the least, is a reflection upon the national administration, which was elected upon a platform pledged to economy.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman know that these abuses existed for 16 years under Republican administration?

Mr. AUSTIN. Therefore the gentleman from Missouri, being a member of a great national party committed to a reform of all of the so-called abuses under Republican administrations, is not excusable, and neither is his party or the administration he supports, when they fail to carry out those pledges and promises upon which they obtained the reins of government.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I take it the gentleman is really in favor of an eight-hour day?

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman's speeches are cumulative evidence of the fact that his party has been derelict in carrying out in good faith its pledges to the American people made upon the election of President Wilson five years ago. Mr. Chairman, I can not join the gentleman from Missouri in his repeated attempts to discredit the work or the record of the splendid efficiency of the Government clerks in Washington City. My humble beginning in the Government service was 40 years ago in the Post Office Department in this city, and in the nine years I have served in this House I have never failed to be interested in legislation which affected their interests. Mr. Chairman, in all fairness, the American Congress is not fair with the District of Columbia. We ought to give the people of the District a Representative in this House. We have given the Philippine Islands two Representatives, Porto Rico a Representative, and many of the American States, with a population less than that of the District of Columbia, have two Senators and a Member of this House. The Capital City ought to be treated fairly and justly, especially so when we keep its inhabitants disfranchised. They have no representative to appear before the respective committees of this House or upon the floor to plead their cause, to urge needed legislation which would promote and advance the interest of the District of Columbia, in which the whole country is interested.

I know many clerks personally. I think they are doing their share in promoting the interests of the Government during this war. Thousands are working night and day. They are making sacrifices of health, comfort, and pleasure to do their full share in aiding a weak and vacillating administration in running the Government. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will observe his loyalty to Woodrow Wilson and the party to which he owes allegiance by ceasing in this public manner in throwing discredit upon our Government and the Democratic national administration by calling indirectly attention to their lack of good faith in redeeming their pledges in reference to economy and the abolishment of useless offices, and so forth. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I do not know just how many times the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has presented this amendment. I have been somewhat in sympathy with his effort to get eight hours of work each day out of every employee of the Government, especially during this crisis. I am also in sympathy with the adjustment of salaries of Government employees that will make them conform to the wages that other people draw doing work of a similar character and amount. I am willing to go into both of those matters at the proper time. The difficulty with my friend from Missouri is that he does not seem to know when he is licked. I do not know just how many times, I repeat, this amendment has been turned down by the House. I do not know how many times I have voted with him to sustain it in its proper place, but this is not the proper place in this bill because there are no employees in the Indian Service who do not work eight hours a day now in the District of Columbia. Now, this bill carries an appropriation for three inspectors who work a part of the time in the District of Columbia, and for about 10 or 12 clerks who work in determining the heirship of the papers after they come to the city of Washington. About 10 or 15 men, perhaps, are employed under this bill in the District of Columbia, and these are the only persons to whom the amendment of my friend of Missouri could, by any possible application of the law, reach; so that I object to bringing it in this bill, asking us to bury it down here in a bill where the public would never look for it, camouflage the amendment when it is put in a bill, fix it so that a lawyer or anyone else hunting it up would have to look every place under the sun to find it. There is a place where the gentleman can present it, but it is not in this bill. I hope the membership of the House will not decide with him to include the amendment in this bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman will recognize that this amendment was offered as a limitation to the appropriations made in this bill?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I so understand.

Mr. BORLAND. And, therefore, in that form it must be offered as a limitation to each bill carrying an appropriation for any employees in the District of Columbia, no matter how many or how few?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Missouri is a member of the Committee on Appropriations of this House. Let the gentleman bring in from his own committee an item providing for this matter and then it can be considered in an orderly way, the way in which we ought to consider a matter before putting it into the law.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to make any statement at this time in reference to this eight-hour proposition during the war, nor am I impressed with the idea that it is of such enormous importance upon this particular bill, but at this particular time we ought to stop and give some little consideration to the conditions that confront us. Now, we have had before the Committee on Appropriations many chiefs of bureaus and scarcely with an exception—there are one or two exceptions—the clerks are working seven hours. Now, I want to submit, especially while the war is going on, about this proposition——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I ask why the department heads do not require them to work eight hours instead of seven, under the law as it exists?

Mr. SISSON. In the first place, the gentleman ought to ask why for 16 years the bureau chiefs, when his party controlled the Government, did not require eight hours and not now criticize us because some of us try to correct the evil we inherited from you.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh!

Mr. SISSON. I decline to be drawn now into a partisan discussion. The gentleman tries to play politics. Not one of us who want to serve patriotically even refer to politics in this discussion.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is not a partisan discussion at all.

Mr. SISSON. Well, do not make it one, then. I decline to yield further. I am not going to be drawn into any partisan discussion, because I am going to presume that this is no time in which to play politics. This is a time when every American in this House worthy of the name should be willing to do that which is necessary to present as united a front as possible and make every patriotic effort to win this war. [Applause.] When a man plays petty, peanut politics on an occasion of this kind it is evident he has little regard for the outcome of the war. I do not care what district he represents or what position he holds in the Government. But here is a proposition that ought to appeal to every man. We are calling upon the people throughout the country to make sacrifices. In every neighborhood we are asking people to buy liberty bonds; we are asking people to make sacrifices and economize and buy thrift stamps. Now, of all the people in the United States the Government clerks ought to be patriotic, and if they are not patriotic they ought to be gotten out of their places and good patriotic men put in their places. Now, they are working only seven hours. They are asking in every bureau great increases in the number of clerks—three or four times as many clerks in many departments, and in some departments many more times than that, than they have in peace times. Now one-seventh of a working day added will be 14 per cent, and if we get eight hours of patriotic service out of these patriotic clerks during the war and have them do that which they ought to do, then, indeed, gentlemen, if every man were working up to the full standard of efficiency you could save 14 per cent in the items of appropriation, and you could save thousands of clerks for other work in civil life and millions of dollars.

Now, these clerks ought to be willing to work eight hours. It is going to depend largely upon the mental attitude of every clerk as to whether or not he will do eight hours of good service. If his mental attitude is such that he is willing that the Government shall require of him through the war eight hours, he will work eight hours and give good work. Here in the seat of government, under the very noses of Cabinet officers, under the very nose of the President, under the very nose of Congress, we allow clerks to do no more than in peace times and at the same time we are going out over the country and asking and demanding that all the people make sacrifices; buy liberty bonds and thrift stamps, use less food and less coal, and deny themselves many things, even necessaries of life. Why, then, could not the Government begin here at home and make these people show some patriotic sacrifice and demonstrate to the country that there is some real patriotism here in the Government? We are piling taxation upon every form of industry. We are asking the great business men to make great sacrifices. We are asking the poor people throughout the country even to take the little thrift stamps. We are asking them to economize in every form. Do we mean it? Are we in earnest? And are we honest with ourselves? Your vote on this amendment will determine. If we are, as Members of Congress we can not shift the responsibility and say it is due to the executive department or bureau chiefs. We make the law for Government clerks and vote money to pay them, and it is our duty as honest legislators to see to it that they do work or get no money. We hold the purse strings in our hands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Gentlemen endeavor to evade their responsibility. You have the purse strings in your hands. You have the right under the rules of this House to put limitations on these bills and say the money shall not be expended, especially during these war times, until in each department the clerks are required to work eight hours; and I sincerely trust that the Members will lay aside for the time being any feeling they may have for individual clerks and deal with the clerks as they do in private business concerns. How many of them will put patriotic buttons not only on their coats but some patriotic buttons on their hearts and have some respect for the Treasury, because the greatest amount of money that is spent now is spent for personal services in order to conduct this Government during the war? Let us, if we can do so, get the 14 per cent additional service out of the clerks during the war.

It is the time to test the patriotism of every clerk, it is time to call upon them to volunteer and for them to say, "I will do that extra hour of work and help save the Government and the taxpayers of this country, whose servant I am."

Many Members of Congress work 10, or 12, or 15 hours a day. You take the Appropriations Committee, and they begin in the morning at 10 o'clock, running until 6, and then the Members have to look after their correspondence in the morning, have to look after their department work at the odd times they can get. Many Members of Congress, all in fact who is performing his duty here, is doing infinitely more than eight hours of service. While the war is on I do not believe in Congress being longer controlled by the contention of merchants and citizens of the District of Columbia, who want the hours such that the clerks can trade at the stores, as was demanded when this matter was up before. The local papers drove Congress before into voting against requiring the clerks from working eight hours. Will not Congress now, under present conditions for the time being, stand up against this influence and get eight hours service from every clerk? You will, unless you are afraid to do right.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has intimated that somebody is talking politics.

Mr. SISSON. I did not intimate it; I stated it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not know to whom he refers.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman ought to be able to recognize his own photograph.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is what I wanted the gentleman to say.

Mr. SISSON. That is all. I have said it now.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the gentleman refers to what I said I repeat, that the duty of enforcing the law is not upon the House of Representatives. The duty of enforcing the law is upon the Executive. We have passed an eight-hour law. It is not the duty of Congress to see that that law is enforced. It is the duty of the Executive. Why, I can not say anything that would be so cruel to this administration as the gentleman from Mississippi has said or that the gentleman from Missouri has said. They both say that we have the purse strings; that we should say to this administration, "You can not use a dollar of the amount of money that we appropriate here if you do not observe the law." I have not said anything so cruel as that, and I shall not. I go upon the assumption that if the attention of the administration is called to the fact that the law now requires an eight-hour day from these clerks, those under whose direction the clerks perform their service will see that they give eight hours instead of seven. We will then get our 14 per cent additional time of service. We ought to have eight hours a day instead of seven. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is not the only man in this House, nor is the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who believes that the department clerks should work 8 hours a day or 10 hours a day during this time in order to perform the duties this public service now requires.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is it not the law that they shall not work over eight hours? The law does not say that they shall work eight hours a day, does it?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is a quibble.

Mr. STEVENSON. One moment, please——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; that is a merely a quibble.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is it not a limitation, not a provision requiring it?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; that is merely a quibble.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let the gentleman state the law as it is.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The fact is that the heads of the departments do not get to their offices until half-past 9 to 10 o'clock. They take two hours for lunch. If you are fortunate, you can get an appointment between 2 and 4 o'clock with the head of a department or with a bureau chief. Why does not this patriot from Missouri and his copatriot from Mississippi attack the Secretaries for not working eight hours a day instead of six or less?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Kansas is doing that?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Why attack these clerks, who are working under the direction of the bureau chiefs or the Secretaries of the departments in which they are employed? The gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Missouri are making attacks upon the administration. I am not. I say that the work of the Government ought now to be done by a less number of employees than we have to-day.

You go through the halls in the War Department and you will find they are cluttered up with employees, many of them doing nothing. I have gone through there and found four or five clerks visiting, hovering over the same typewriter's desk. You will find in every hall in the War Department clerks so thick that they are in each other's way, reading newspapers, gossiping, manicuring their nails, wasting their time even during the seven hours. Whose fault is it—that of the clerks? No. The fault is that of those under whose direction they are employed.

In the first place, one-fourth of them could better be employed in their homes than here. The other three-fourths could perform the public service if they were required to do so, if every one of them was required to work not only eight hours a day but to work while they are on the job.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Missouri will withhold a moment, I want to present a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. RUCKER. Very well.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent that all debate be closed on this amendment in five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman make that seven minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment be closed in seven minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is now recognized.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I am not specially commissioned to defend my colleague from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] from the attacks made upon him here by gentlemen because he offers this amendment many times to many bills. It occurs to me, however, that in offering it he is representing about 100,000,000 of taxpayers in the United States. Gentlemen who oppose it may be representing those who are the beneficiaries of the taxes paid by the people. They gratuitously, no doubt, offer their services.

I am not prepared to believe that the great army of clerks in the various departments in Washington are so unpatriotic as to appeal to any gentleman on the floor of this House to sustain them in the abominable practice, the unpatriotic practice, of performing only seven hours' service a day. If the wages paid are not sufficient, they ought to be paid higher wages, but every clerk ought to be required to perform a reasonable day's work, and eight hours a day is reasonable. If any clerk does not want to perform such service, there ought to be some way to kick that clerk out of the service entirely, and I would not be nice or tender in the method of getting rid of him or her.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] speaks knowingly, because he speaks from personal observation, of conditions in the War Department, and he tells us that he frequently goes there and finds five or six clerks hovering over the desk of a stenographer or a typewriter—presumably a typewriter of the female persuasion [laughter]—and the gentleman from Kansas, it seems, places himself around that same typewriter when he goes to the department. [Laughter.]

If the gentleman is appealing in behalf of that typewriter, who perhaps puts in several hours of the time daily in entertaining Members of the House, then, so far as that one whose time and patience is so severely taxed is concerned, I would ask for an amendment to the amendment excluding that one. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is not one, but the desks clutter the hallways of the entire department.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, the gentleman ought to confine himself to one—if she is good-looking, at least. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, I have long since ceased to be interested in any typewriter, be she blond or brunette. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I can not submit to these impertinent and irrelevant remarks. But if the gentleman is interested in a number of the occupants of these typewriter desks that he visits and will indicate the number I will try to have them all excepted from the operation of this amendment. [Laughter.]

Then the amendment ought to be adopted. It is at least in bad taste—if gentlemen will pardon me—for any Member of this House or of this committee, when people are being burdened to death with taxation, to stand here and insist that those who perform service in a steam-heated room in winter and in an ice-cooled room in summer shall work only 7 hours a day when men who work in the frigid blasts of winter and the torrid heat of summer are required to work 10 or 12 hours a day to pay the taxes we impose upon them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER. I will if the gentleman desires to ask about anything except the typewriter desk. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes. The gentleman has passed the typewriter's desk.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, no; I could not get to it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be allowed two minutes more. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. I will try to answer the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman from Missouri have any good reason to believe that the Secretary of the Interior—and this bill is under his department—would observe a limitation upon the appropriation made in this bill any more than he would observe the eight-hour law now on the statute? Why is it necessary to accumulate law on this subject?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman I want to say that if I am correctly informed, he is misinformed as to the law. The law with reference to clerkships in Washington, as I understand, provides that the clerks shall perform not less than seven hours' work per day, and that law is evidently construed by the departments as fixing seven hours as a day's work. This amendment proposes to fix it definitely at eight hours a day, and it ought to have the vote of every gentleman here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma) there were—ayes 20, noes 26.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors among Indians, $150,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This morning I happened to run across an account of the work during the past year of the agent of the Indian Rights Association, as applied directly to the suppression of the liquor traffic. I am interested in this question because the account to which I refer deals with the remnant of a tribe who have gone to Wisconsin from my native town of Stockbridge, in Massachusetts. Stockbridge was originally an Indian settlement, and the first white people went there as missionaries to the Indians. To-day we revere their memory and are interested in the welfare of their descendants. There are 560 of these men and women in a town called Red Springs, in Wisconsin, and the account of this agent of the Indian Rights Association is that these Indians there are very fast becoming depraved through the use of intoxicating liquors, which they are able to obtain because they also have secured citizenship. Nevertheless they are a tribal community and on a tribal basis, and receive certain annuities from the Government. They should therefore receive the protection of the Government under this appropriation for the suppression of the liquor traffic.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Are not these Indian reservations all in prohibition territory?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am not informed whether Red Springs, Wis., is in prohibition territory or not, but the item under discussion is one for the suppression of the liquor traffic among Indians, and I am interested to know whether any effort is being made in this direction. Nothing on this subject appears in the very brief report of the committee, and I am interested to know what care is being taken of these descendants of the Stockbridge Indians. This report concludes by saying—

One feels that the good old Massachusetts town's name in Wisconsin ought to be cleaned up in some way if possible, at least prevented from becoming a synonym for down-and-out drunkards and nuisances.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows how this $150,000 is to be expended?

Mr. TREADWAY. I looked in the brief committee report for some reference as to how it was expended, but could find no reference to it, and that is one reason for my making these remarks; to see if any information can be secured on this very point that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] asks about.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I could not hear the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL]. His back was turned to me.

Mr. JUUL. I should like to ask how this $150,000 for the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors among Indians is to be expended. Are we to have no itemized statement of the expenditure?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is to be expended for deputies for the prosecution of whisky cases and for the seizure of liquor, and in any way necessary for the prevention of the liquor traffic in Indian countries.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the time.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will ask an extension of my time.

Mr. JUUL. Does not the gentleman think we should be advised in some way as to where this money is going?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will look on page 21 of the hearings, he will find there just as full an explanation as can be had. We could not put all these matters into our report, because that would make such a voluminous document that nobody in the House would read it to find out what he wanted to know. There is full information on page 21 of the hearings.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the chairman of the committee whether there is any information as to whether liquor is allowed among Indians maintaining their tribal relations who have also become citizens?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. A great amount of money is spent for the prevention of the liquor traffic in Oklahoma. Every Indian in the State of Oklahoma is a citizen and has the full rights of citizens and can vote just as any other man under our constitution. Yet the larger part of this money is spent in the State of Oklahoma for the suppression of the liquor traffic among Indians who are citizens of the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. I should like to read a few sentences from the newspaper extract which I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. This clipping says:

The Stockbridge Indians, whose existence has been recalled to us only now and then by dry, small mentions of them in legislative proceedings or items in the State's blue book, turn up in piteous and pathetic guise in the report lately published of the year's work of the Indian Rights Association, the society maintained principally through the indefatigable and broadly varigated altruism of Mr. Herbert Welsh, of Philadelphia. It appears from the narrative of the western rounds of his traveling agent, Mr. Matthew Sniffen, that what are left of the Indian folk long lingering among us at Stockbridge, in this State, are now in Wisconsin and are technically known as "the Wisconsin Stockbridges." There are 560 of them, all now potentially landowners, citizens, and taxpayers. Six years ago, in order that they might secure more of the benefit of the local taxes they paid in roadmaking and town improvements, schools, etc., their half of the township where they are was incorporated as Red Springs. Some of the Indians were elected county officers, but most of the positions were filled by whites who had bought their lots from the Indians. Soon thereafter Red Springs granted liquor licenses, and there are now two saloons (formerly three), both of which are kept by Stockbridges. Because the Stockbridges are citizens they can buy liquor without question at these saloons. But as the Stockbridges are still on a tribal basis and receive certain annuities from the Government, it is the hope of Mr. Sniffen that he can save the small group that has not succumbed to the liquor habit and kindred vices through the operation of the Federal statutes if the State authorities will back up his action

And then follows the sentence which I read before:

One feels that the good old Massachusetts town's name in Wisconsin ought to be cleaned up in some way if possible, at least prevented from becoming a synonym for down-and-out drunkards and nuisances.

I share that feeling as a native of the town from which this tribe took its name, afterwards going to Wisconsin. The old Housatonic and Stockbridge Indians were first sent to western New York, and as shown by this account are now located in the town of Red Springs, Wis. Taking pride in the name they bear, which is the name of the town from which their ancestors come, of which town I am also a native-born citizen, I do hope that something can be done in connection with the appropriation for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians, the item now before us for consideration, to protect these descendants of that tribe. We all know the difficulty with the Indian with respect to liquor. The Indian blood is perhaps susceptible to the influence of fire water; but I shall be glad, indeed, if this newspaper clipping which I have read to the committee can receive the attention of the department. As a result I hope some special effort will be made for the protection of these few Indians who have gone from Massachusetts to Wisconsin.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The department has the right under this item to render them such protection in accordance with the decisions of the court

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, this must certainly be interesting to our prohibition friends. Here is an item of $150,000 to be appropriated for the suppression of the sale of liquor among the Indian tribes. The chairman of the committee informs us that the greater part of it is to be expended in Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No; not the greater part, but a large part.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Well, in Oklahoma and other territory. Oklahoma, we are informed, is a bone-dry State. It seems strange and peculiar that we are called upon to expend $150,000 for the suppression of the sale of liquor in a bone-dry State.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the State of Illinois and other States would adopt a prohibition amendment, this whisky could not be sent into Oklahoma from Chicago and other parts of the country, and therefore I hope that we may have national prohibition adopted.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is not the point at all. The question is this: Congress passed a law to prohibit the transportation of liquor into bone-dry territory. Illinois does not cut any figure in this argument. The fact is that we are now called upon to expend an additional $150,000 to protect the Indians in their reservations from the sale of liquor in bone-dry prohibition territory. Does prohibition prohibit?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer a word, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr.

GALLAGHER]. It was discussed very fully a month ago, when the prohibition amendment was pending here, that if the States that are wet around States that are dry could be made dry, the question of enforcing the prohibition laws in dry States in large measure would be solved.

But, upon the suggestion that has been made, I want to point out a concrete case. Idaho became dry by statute a little over two years ago. During the first year Idaho was dry the Coeur d'Alene Indian Tribe increased in population, and its birth rate exceeded its death rate for the first time in many years. As was said to me by one of the most responsible Indians in the tribe and later confirmed by the Indian agent, the immediate cause for the increase in population—for the death rate falling below the birth rate—was because of the suppression of the liquor traffic in Idaho and the wiping out of drunkenness among the Coeur d'Alene Indians. [Applause.] This case stands forth as a concrete one. Undoubtedly the law is violated in different places, and so are other laws. But we must look to general results, and the appropriation of $150,000 for the purpose of enforcing the law among Indians will go far toward bringing about better conditions in States that are dry, and especially in States not under the prohibition system.

Mr. Chairman, I regret the time limit compels me to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. FRENCH. On this subject of prohibition.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. FRENCH. I might have supposed that the gentleman from Wisconsin would object.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have adopted a policy not to allow Members to extend remarks in the RECORD on prohibition.

Mr. FOCHT. Who adopted such a policy?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma demands the regular order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will pardon me for a moment, I ask, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment and paragraph close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FOCHT. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have five minutes on this subject of prohibition.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I will make it 10 minutes.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not insist on his objection and deprive the gentleman from Idaho of the right to extend his remarks. The gentleman from Wisconsin has had the floor for eighty or ninety times during the last four or five days while the gentleman from Idaho for the first time, as I remember, has asked for a few minutes time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to interpose any objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho to extend his remarks. He had his time on the prohibition amendment. I waived my time so that the gentleman from California could read a letter that was written by Mr. Gompers. I wish to withdraw my objection, although he had an opportunity then to express himself on that occasion and I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the gentleman from Idaho, who is a student of sociology, or any other rabid prohibitionist, whether he comes from Maine or Georgia or any other State where prohibition has been enforced for many years—I will except Maine, because the distinguished gentleman from that State admitted that notwithstanding prohibition had been on the statute books for years it was absolutely impossible to enforce it—can show that in their States the birth rate had so peculiarly and in such a short time found expression in birth development as was instanced by that student of birth control, the gentleman from Idaho. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Wisconsin is not discussing the question. The question of prohibition was settled by this Congress the other day by a two-thirds majority.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course I should expect the gentleman from California would rise to interpose some objection, even when we are attempting in a serious way to control the liquor traffic among the Indians, which everybody admits is a necessity.

This appropriation was increased some years ago, and it had my strong support. Every person who believes in a liberal policy, so far as the drink question is concerned, recognizes the necessity of keeping liquor away from the Indians. We all know that it is their destruction and their downfall. I am too far separated from the Indian reservations of Wisconsin to give to the gentleman from Massachusetts any information whatsoever as to the conditions prevailing among the Stockbridge Indians, but, Mr. Chairman, I rose primarily, because I am such a firm believer in keeping liquor away from the Indians, to ask why the committee struck out from the bill the provision carried in the act of last year that sought, in a drastic manner, to keep the liquor away from the Indians? I direct the attention of the committee to that provision carried in last year's bill immediately following this appropriation which provided that automobiles or any other vehicles used in introducing or attempting to introduce intoxicants into the Indian country, or where the introduction is prohibited by treaty or Federal statute, whether used by the owner thereof or other persons, shall be subject to seizure or liable to forfeiture, and so forth. Was that regarded as permanent law and is that the reason it is left out of this bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is undoubtedly permanent law and it is not necessary to reenact it from year to year.

Mr. STAFFORD. It seems to me it may be questioned whether it is permanent law.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Indian Bureau so regards it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Interior Department has given that construction to it, it is sufficient for my purpose.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I rose a few moments ago to protest against the objection raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] extending his remarks in the RECORD. Are not some gentlemen carrying too far this matter of objecting to Members of the House incorporating certain letters and documents in connection with their speeches in the RECORD? Several days ago my good and benevolent friend, Judge KINKAID, of Nebraska, offered a letter as part of his remarks, and to my surprise I heard an objection raised. Later on our distinguished friend from New York, Mr. HICKS, or a gentleman for him, asked that he be permitted to publish in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech which he delivered upon observations he made while on the battle line in Europe. Here was a patriotic and esteemed Member of this House, who went so far as to travel up and down the front line of trenches, thus coldly snubbed. Think how valuable his impartial and dispassionate observations might be to the country, yet objection was raised. Then, within a few seconds, another gentleman rose and asked that there might be incorporated in the RECORD the speech of Lloyd-George, of England. Thus, while denying the right of an American citizen and a Member of this House to have published in the RECORD a speech upon his observations in Europe, there was permitted the incorporation of a speech by Lloyd-George. Of course, one has a right to object, but I am afraid that it is going too far when gentlemen exercise the right of objection every time a Member of this House rises to obtain permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD. While personally I have not been refused any permission, in common justice to other Members I am constrained to protest against this chronic and indiscriminate refusal, which, to say the least, is not in good taste and accomplishes nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RELIEVING DISTRESS, ETC.

For the relief and care of destitute Indians not otherwise provided for, and for the prevention and treatment of tuberculosis, trachoma, smallpox, and other contagious and infectious diseases, including transportation of patients to and from hospitals and sanatoria, $350,000; Provided, That not to exceed $90,000 of said amount may be expended in the construction and equipment of new hospitals at a unit cost of not exceeding $15,000: Provided further, That this appropriation may be used also for general medical and surgical treatment of Indians, including the maintenance and operation of general hospitals, where no other funds are applicable or available for that purpose: And provided further, That out of the appropriation herein authorized there shall be available for the maintenance of the sanatoria and hospitals hereinafter named, and for incidental and all other expenses for their proper conduct and management, including pay of employees, repairs, equipment, and improvements, not to exceed the following amounts: Blackfeet hospital, Montana, $10,000; Carson hospital, Nevada, $10,000; Cheyenne and Arapahoe hospital, Oklahoma, $10,000; Choctaw and Chickasaw hospital, Oklahoma, $25,000; Fort Lapwai sanatorium, Idaho, $40,000; Laguna sanatorium, New Mexico, $17,000; Mescalero hospital, New Mexico, $10,000; Navajo sanatorium, New Mexico, $10,000; Pima hospital, Arizona, $10,000; Phoenix sanatorium, Arizona, $40,000; Spokane hospital, Washington, $10,000; Sac and Fox sanatorium, Iowa, $25,000; Turtle Mountain hospital, North Dakota, $10,000; Winnebago hospital, Nebraska, $15,000; Crow Creek hospital, South Dakota, $8,000; Hoopa Valley hospital, California, $8,000; Jicarilla hospital, New Mexico, $8,000; Truxton Canyon camp hospital, Arizona, $8,000; Indian Oasis hospital, Arizona, $8,000.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the language, beginning on line 21, page 5, "and for the prevention and treatment of tuberculosis, trachoma, smallpox, and other contagious and infectious diseases."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, amend by striking out, in lines 21, 22, and 23, the language "and for the prevention and treatment of tuberculosis, trachoma, smallpox, and other contagious and infectious diseases."

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, if the language be left in the bill as it is now, you would not be able to expend a dollar for a broken leg or for the treatment of any disease other than those enumerated. A broken leg would not be a contagious or infectious disease. I hope the gentleman having the bill in charge will accept the amendment and strike out that language.

I think the gentleman can well afford to accept the amendment; it will make a better bill out of it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I will say for the gentleman's benefit that it is not the intention of this item at all to take care of broken legs or anything else, except what is set forth in the item. It has never been carried in the item in the past, and the Indian Bureau has never suggested that it should be done. The purpose of this item is just as stated in the item itself, for the care of destitute Indians and for the prevention and treatment of tuberculosis, trachoma, smallpox, and other contagious and infectious diseases. Now, that was established for that purpose and nothing else. There are cases in which broken legs of Indians are taken care of—in some instances out of tribal funds and in some instances out of the individual funds of the members of a tribe. Now, if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, it is a revolutionary amendment; the Department of the Interior will probably rule, as the inclination usually has been in the past, to take the fund from the Treasury rather than from the tribal fund, and therefore place an additional tax upon the Federal Treasury that should not be placed there. This has already been authorized with the consent of the Indians and all others concerned.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman will permit me a moment, I think if the gentleman will read the bill carefully again he will see that he enumerates certain diseases—tuberculosis, trachoma, smallpox—and then you put in the words "and other contagious and infectious diseases."

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman want to ask a question?

Mr. JUUL. Just a moment and I will ask the question. Now, I want to ask if it is not a fact that every time you expend a dollar outside of the diseases named that somebody will have to pass upon whether the disease for which you expend that dollar is an infectious or contagious disease?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, that is the intent of the item.

Mr. JUUL. Who is to pass upon that?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The men at the different agencies pass on it. There is a doctor at every reservation, The purpose of this—now, if the gentleman will let me use a little of my own time—is to prevent the spread of contagious diseases not only among the Indians but among the white people, and to care for destitute Indians.

Mr. JUUL. I understand.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. This appropriation does not contemplate taking care of every Indian that is found with a sore finger or something else of that kind, or even if he is injured seriously. That is taken care of in other ways, and is not contemplated by this item in the bill.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor, but his time has expired.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman had stopped talking, and I had begun to speak——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has never recognized anybody but the gentleman from Illinois, who offered an amendment.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The Chair knows more about it than I do, but I ask for recognition now.

The CHAIRMAN. The colloquy between the chairman of the committee and the gentleman who offered the amendment was very enlightening and the gentleman——

Mr. JUUL. I would like to know how the chairman of the committee obtained the floor.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my colleague have five minutes, as his time was all taken up.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I was trying to make the chairman of the committee understand that somewhere, somehow, you would have to have men appointed at all these Indian reservations to pass on the diseases, as I take it for granted the Indian agents are not competent to do so.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They have a doctor on every reservation, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. JUUL. That is good. Now, you enumerate four or five diseases, and I maintain if you are to expend the money rigidly for certain diseases and not for certain other diseases you ought to be made to enumerate the diseases for which you want to expend the money.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Any contagious disease.

Mr. JUUL. I maintain the classification of contagious and infectious is so you could not pass on it nor can the average man on the average Indian reservation, and if a man is entitled to relief from this $450,000 expenditure he would be entitled to that relief long before somebody could examine him and pass on whether his disease is contagious or infectious, and I hope you gentlemen——

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. NORTON. Has not the gentleman illustrated the fact that a little knowledge is sometimes a very dangerous thing? May I inquire, has the gentleman read the entire provision for this appropriation?

Mr. JUUL. I just listened to it read and I hold the bill in my hand——

Mr. NORTON. If so, I call the attention of the gentleman to this part of the paragraph:

Provided, That this appropriation may be used also for general medical and physical treatment of Indians——

Mr. JUUL. Is that the question?

Mr. NORTON. That is the question.

Mr. JUUL. All right.

Mr. NORTON. "Including the maintenance and operation of general hospitals."

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman is using up my time. Now, I want to say to the gentleman that if Members on this floor were permitted occasionally by certain gentlemen to participate in the debates you would have good, trained debaters, but as long as there are two or three men here who are going to consume all the time, jumping up every minute and saying to the Chairman, "Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object" [laughter], it is very disheartening and discouraging to men who would like to come from the Office Building over here and help to transact the business of the country.

When you can find in two or three days the names of certain gentlemen, fifty or sixty or seventy times in the RECORD, and then see these same gentlemen get up and object when another gentlemen for the first time in a week or 10 days asks for leave to print a few pages you have my answer to the wherefore and why some of the people on this floor are not as bright as you are.

Mr. NORTON. I do not believe——

Mr. JUUL. And I yield the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman in his statement could have had any reference to me. I have had no objection to granting time to the gentleman to speak or to any other gentleman of the House. Personally, I should be delighted to see the gentleman attend the sessions every moment of the time.

Mr. JUUL. I will say to the gentleman that there is mighty little encouragement for anyone to do it.

Mr. NORTON. I am sure that since I have been a Member of the House my efforts have been to encourage Members to attend the sessions of the House and of the Committee of the Whole. I have thought the gentleman in this case had not read the whole paragraph, because there is a provision in the paragraph which carries out the very idea that the gentleman seems to desire to have carried out. On page 6, beginning in line 3, the paragraph provides—

That this appropriation may be used——

Mr. JUUL. What is the line?

Mr. NORTON. Beginning on line 3, page 6:

Provided further, That this appropriation may be used also for general medical and surgical treatment of Indians, including the maintenance and operation of general hospitals, where no other funds are applicable or available for that purpose.

Mr. JUUL. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. So under this provision an Indian with a broken leg or other injury, unless there was some other provision made for his care, could be cared for. Further in the same paragraph it provides that part of this appropriation shall be used for the maintenance or operation of a number of hospitals, which are specifically named in the paragraph. Now, I thought perhaps the gentleman had not read all of the paragraph.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. I will be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. Now, then, if the statement you have made is correct, and I have not the slightest doubt——

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman will know it is correct if he will read the paragraph.

Mr. JUUL. Just a moment. Then, if that is correct, why enumerate any of the diseases, when, on page 6, as you say, the bill reads:

Provided further, That this appropriation may be used also for general medical and surgical treatment of Indians.

Mr. NORTON. I will tell the gentleman why. It is simply because the main purpose of this appropriation of $350,000 is for the treatment of tuberculosis, trachoma, smallpox, and other contagious diseases. That is why.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last half of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] any request to make?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman from Michigan want to discuss this item?

Mr. CRAMTON. For a minute, unless there is a sudden emergency here and you want to adjourn.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. CRAMTON. One minute or two minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I think there is some force in the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL]. This is the first time that I have tried to say a word in three days on this bill. I think it is time, while, perhaps, I am not the best one to do it, for some one to call attention to the language in the bill. The first few words, so far as authority goes, are sufficient to enable to be done under this appropriation just the thing the chairman of the committee has told us it was not intended should be done. That is to say, the language is:

For the relief and care of destitute Indians not otherwise provided for.

Now, anything "for the relief or care of destitute Indians not otherwise provided for" can be done under this section, provided the committee has appropriated enough money. But in that connection the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] has just said that the main purpose of this section was to relieve from smallpox and tuberculosis and other diseases mentioned. If he will read on down through the section, he will find $282,000 is expressly appropriated for existing hospitals and a limit of $90,000 provided for new hospitals, so that if they use that $90,000 and the $282,000 we have a total of $372,000 for hospitals alone out of an appropriation of $350,000. That deficit of $22,000, I suppose, may be devoted to the prevention of tuberculosis or smallpox.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. All of the three minutes I have remaining.

Mr. NORTON. I will ask the gentleman whether he would expect these diseases to be treated in a hospital or blacksmith's shop?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will answer the gentleman by saying that a great deal of the most important work for the prevention of the spread of tuberculosis is done entirely outside of any hospital whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, let me ask unanimous consent for about two minutes, that I may speak right on this amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto is closed by unanimous consent. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUPPORT OF INDIAN SCHOOLS.

For the support of Indian day and industrial schools not otherwise provided for, for other educational and industrial purposes in connection therewith, $1,600,000: Provided, That not to exceed $40,000 of this amount may be used for the support and education of deaf and dumb or blind Indian children: Provided further, That not more than $200,000 of the amount herein appropriated may be expended for the tuition of Indian children enrolled in the public schools: Provided further, That hereafter no appropriation, except appropriations made pursuant to treaties, shall be used to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood whose parents are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they live and where there are adequate free school facilities provided: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the support of Indian day and industrial schools where specific appropriation is made.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to proceed unless I can speak just a moment on what we have passed, and that must, of course, be by unanimous consent.

I think there is some misapprehension as to the moneys used for the care of the health of the Indians. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] referred to the moneys appropriated here as though this included everything appropriated for health purposes. Going through the bill you will find that doctors are provided for. Their compensation is provided for in the separate items. There are other separate items providing for the purchase of medical supplies.

The hospitals provided for in the last paragraph are maintained for the special purpose of caring for Indians gathered in from the different reservations afflicted with one of the dread diseases. Indian communities as well as white communities are interested in maintaining health conditions among the Indians, and here are diseases that can be handled best by large agencies. Now, a great many of the Indians are capable of employing their own doctors. They have their own private incomes, and they spend their money, as do white people, for the health of their families.

Again, there are Indians who are not permitted to handle their own money altogether, but yet in case of sickness their money is expended for them. There is provision also in the paragraph we have just approved for taking care of Indians who may be unable in any way to receive care other than as provided in the paragraph. But, as has been stated by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON], the item in question is to provide for definite sanitariums throughout the country for the care of Indians in whose care and in whose health whole communities of Indians, as well as whites, are vitally interested.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDIAN SCHOOL AND AGENCY BUILDINGS.

For construction, lease, purchase, repair, and improvement of school and agency buildings, including the purchase of necessary lands and the installation, repair, and improvement of heating, lighting, power, and sewerage and water systems in connection therewith, $400,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for the payment of salaries and expenses of persons employed in the supervision of construction work on school and agency buildings in the Indian Service: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to allow employees in the Indian Service who are furnished quarters necessary heat and light for such quarters without charge, such heat and light to be paid for out of the fund chargeable with the cost of heating and lighting other buildings at the same place: And provided further, That the amount so expended for agency purposes shall not be included in the maximum amounts for compensation of employees prescribed by section 1, act of August 24, 1912.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the first proviso is new language.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has this appropriation heretofore been available for the payment of the salaries of the supervisory force engaged on construction work?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. My recollection is that the assistant commissioner told us that it was, and that he wanted this proviso put in the bill simply to avoid any difficulty with the comptroller in case there should be any probability of his making a different ruling. This is new language and subject to a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. This appropriation of $400,000 is the same as that in last year's bill?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it virtually a permanent appropriation, or is there any policy on the part of the bureau whereby they have called the attention of the committee to the need of new buildings? I have noticed that the appropriations in many items are virtually the same as in prior years.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They are.

Mr. STAFFORD. It occurs to me that some of the activities would be less. There would not be need of the same amount of appropriation. Here is a considerable amount, $400,000. The gentleman from Idaho has given an instance of the very extensive and rapid increase in the birth rate in one Indian reservation. Of course, it is generally known that for nearly a quarter of a century or half a century past the death rate among the Indians has been far in excess of the birth rate. What is the need of having new buildings provided for these Indians? I assume that there has been adequate provision in the past, so far as schoolhouse accommodations are concerned. Will the gentleman indicate what the policy is of providing $400,000 here for new buildings and the repair of existing buildings?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. A large part of this appropriation of course is used for repairs. The gentleman knows that whenever a new school is established for Indian pupils it is necessary to have school buildings at some place. We have instances where schools which Indian children have been able to attend have been moved, as in the case of mission schools, for instance. It is necessary to inaugurate a school if no public school or other institution is available for the education of the children there. Then, the natural decay of the buildings sometimes necessitates the construction of new buildings. A great many of these buildings are frame, and quite a few of them are small day-school buildings out on the reservations, and they go to wrack very fast.

The assumption that our Indian population has been rapidly on the decline is more or less fallacious. I doubt if there were ever as many Indians in this country as was at one time supposed. The census of 1910 I understand to have shown an increase over 1900, and I am sure the next census will show a very material increase over 1910. Now, as reservations have been opened up; as Indian children are persuaded to attend schools, just in that proportion must educational facilities, including buildings, be provided. That accounts for the expenditures necessary for new buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give the committee the amount last year and preceding years that has been used for new construction work and the amount expended in repairs?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not think a statement as to that has been given by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give us an idea of how much of this $400,000, on the average, has been used for new construction and how much for repairs?

Mr. HAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman that it was developed at the hearings before our committee that a little over $134,000 had been expended last year for the construction of buildings, and for repairs and rent $128,000. The hearings go on to show further that the present value of the buildings in the Indian Service constructed out of this item is $7,500,000, and that this appropriation of $400,000 is about 5½ per cent of that amount, which is a reasonable amount to carry on that work with buildings of that character.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDIAN SCHOOL TRANSPORTATION.

For collection and transportation of pupils to and from Indian and public schools, and for placing school pupils, with the consent of their parents, under the care and control of white families qualified to give them moral, industrial, and educational training, $72,000: Provided, That not exceeding $5,000 of this sum may be used for obtaining remunerative employment for Indian youths and, when necessary, for payment of transportation and other expenses to their places of employment: Provided further, That where practicable the transportation and expenses so paid shall be refunded and provisions of this section shall also apply to native Indian pupils of school age under 21 years of age brought from Alaska.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FESS. An incident came to my notice some weeks ago indicating that there must be some misunderstanding somewhere in the matter of letting contracts for teachers in the Indian schools. I refer to the case of a lady who went from Ohio upon invitation, to take a position as teacher in what was called a boarding school, and when she reached the place the conditions were entirely different from the description sent to her. The salary was the same, but when she reached the school she found there was no provision whatever for lodging there, and she was compelled to take lodging a mile and a half away from the school, and there was no facility for transportation from where she lived to the school where she taught. She spoke to the superintendent, and he said that there was no authority given to him to provide for her transportation, although he realized that it was a great hardship. She wrote to me about it, I presume because she is from my section of the State, and she knows that I am interested in school matters. I wrote her and expressed the fear that she had not fully acquainted herself with conditions there before she went, and had gone West blindly. She writes me a second letter and says that she did make inquiry. She says—

I never questioned the school, because I know quite a little about the Indian boarding schools. My superintendent has written to Washington, telling them that the school is a mile and a half away, and that he can not furnish transportation. Yet the school authorities wrote me, "Would you accept a position at Round Valley boarding school?"

Now, this lady is a splendid college woman, whom I happen to know, and she is really suffering under I would not say a misrepresentation, for I think that language is too strong, but she suffers from a lack of information, and I think there ought to be some relief somewhere.

Mr. NORTON. Where is this school located?

Mr. FESS. At Cobelo, Cal.

Mr. NORTON. I am not personally acquainted with that school. There may be some one on the committee who is acquainted with it. At the boarding schools, as a rule, places are provided for the housing of the teachers.

Mr. FESS. So she understood.

Mr. NORTON. If boarding and sleeping quarters are not provided at this school, and if it is held out as a boarding school, it is an unusual condition.

Mr. FESS. I would state that that is precisely the situation. She went there thinking that it was a boarding school. It is named as a boarding school.

Mr. NORTON. If there are no dormitories, and if there is no provision for the housing of the pupils and teachers, it properly should be called a day school. Is the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA of California] acquainted with that school?

Mr. LEA of California. I am not acquainted with the details of the school. In fact, I have never been at the school building, and have not been in that valley for several years.

Mr. FESS. Acting upon the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, I have referred the matter to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, hoping that a correction of the conditions may be made.

The Clerk read as follows:

PER CAPITA COST.

That hereafter, except for pay of superintendents and for transportation of goods and supplies and transportation of pupils, not more than $200 shall be expended from appropriations made in this act, or any other act, for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any Indian school, unless the attendance in any school shall be less than 100 pupils, in which case the Secretary of the Interior may authorize a per capita expenditure of not to exceed $225: Provided, That the total amount appropriated for the support of such school shall not be exceeded: Provided further, That the number of pupils in any school entitled to the per capita allowance hereby provided for shall be determined by taking the average attendance for the entire fiscal year and not any fractional part thereof: Provided further, That the foregoing shall also apply to expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on this paragraph. There has been quite a radical departure in the policy of the committee as to the amount to be allowed to these various Indian schools for the per capita cost of each pupil attending a school. I believe heretofore the rate has been $165 per annum.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Heretofore there has been no limitation, in fact.

Mr. STAFFORD. While there may not have been any statutory rate, there has been a rate agreed upon by the committee, which has been the basis of the computations for the various appropriations for the support of these schools.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Heretofore there has been a law which restricted expenditures at each school to $167 per capita, but each year since I have been in Congress every Indian appropriation bill passed by this House has carried an exemption of that provision until last session.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee what the average amount has been in the past year or two that could be utilized for the education of pupils at these Indian schools?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That could be utilized for the last year?

Mr. STAFFORD. The last several years.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Prior to the last year there was an exemption from the act restricting expenditures to $167. Last year we made no exemption, so that it was necessary, before the session closed, to bring in a joint resolution permitting expenditures for the current fiscal year of not to exceed $200 per capita. Since that resolution has been passed a great many of the Indian schools have had to close, or are about to close, because the per capita of $200 was not sufficient. This condition applies mostly to the small schools, where the attendance is 100 or less.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then in this suggested law you ask $225 as the maximum in these small schools?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. But in the larger schools, where the attendance is over 100, you make the limit $200?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give any information to the committee as to what has been the average rate of expenditure in the past year, for instance, at those schools where the attendance is over 100?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It has been from about $148, as I recall, up to as high as the limit would permit. In some instances they tell us that the schools will have to stop, and the Appropriation Committee has now before it a deficiency request of $250,000 for the continuation of these schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who has determined in former years what amount should be allowed for the per capita cost, aside from the maximum amount of the appropriation?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The office of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STAFFORD. So all that is being attempted here is to place a limitation on his authority?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. All that is being attempted here is to place an actual limitation on his authority, rather than the theoretical one that we have had in the past.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think these amounts are liberal enough, in view of the present high costs, to keep the schools running?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman that I am sure these amounts are not excessive.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose that there are instances where the amount could be less, provided the numbers were greater.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In the school at Chilocco, Okla., the expenditure rarely exceeds $167 per capita, but that is a very large school, with a good superintendent, and has several acres of land which are used to assist in its support.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. The limit of appropriation will not necessarily increase the allowance to these schools where the expenditures have been less?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not think so. Of course when you put on a limitation as to the amount that can be used in the Government service there is a tendency to reach that amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. I recognize that.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Without some kind of a limitation they might exceed these expenditures; some schools have been reaching almost $300 per capita, and in one instance over that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where are those schools located?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Two small schools in California.

Mr. STAFFORD. What will be the result of the limitation on those two schools?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. When the facts about these two schools came before the committee, the Indian Committee got the Commissioner of Indian Affairs before them and they insisted very strongly that these two schools must be brought within a reasonable amount or the Indian Committee would expect to take radical action with reference to them. The result was that these two schools have been brought down until they come within the limit of $225.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Do these provisions in regard to the per capita expenditure apply only to indigent children?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They apply to all.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I understand that some of these Indians are wealthy and would be abundantly able to educate their children the same as any other person in the United States. These provisions apply to the children of Indians that own oil lands worth hundreds of thousands of dollars and who are being paid thousands of dollars monthly in royalties for oil. It applies to them the same as to indigent children.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the only Indians that I know of which have a large interest in oil lands are in Oklahoma. This bill provides under the Oklahoma section for the use of $40,000 for the education of the Osage Indians. As I understand, not one dollar of any of this money appropriated in the general amount is used on the Osage Reservation. Then, there is authorized to be used from the tribal funds of the Five Civilized Tribes $450,000 for the support of their schools. Last year something less than $300,000 was used. That is the tribe contribution to the school fund from which they are educated. Moreover, every one of these children, or many of them, and their parents have taxable property in the State of Oklahoma. They are taxed for the support of State schools, and all of them are permitted free entry into any State, county, or district school in the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, this provision purposes to limit the amount to be expended in any school for supplies and transportation of pupils to $200 per capita where the schools have an attendance or an enrollment of more than 100 pupils, and to $225 per capita where the schools have an enrollment of less than 100.

In my experience on the Indian appropriation bill during the past six years I have found it very difficult to tell just what money was being expended by the Government in any one place for the support and civilization of the Indians. I have found it apparently to be a long-standing practice of the Indian Bureau, intentionally or otherwise, to cover up in a multiplicity of separate reports the total amount of money that is expended at the different Indian schools and at the different Indian agencies.

About four years ago I called for a statement from the Indian Bureau giving the total amount in detail that was expended at each of the Indian agencies and Indian schools of the country including the amount regularly appropriated for the agency or school in the Indian appropriation bill. I found a tremendous difference in the actual amounts expended and the amount appropriated each year in this bill. I found cases where in this bill $5,000 was appropriated for an agency, and there was expended by the Indian Bureau as much as $60,000 or $80,000 out of trust and other funds for the same agency. Of where this additional money comes from that is expended by the Indian Bureau the ordinary Member of Congress is not advised. In 1916 a law was passed requiring that all appropriations used for the support and civilization of Indians be made in the Indian appropriation bill. You will find in section 25 of this bill that $2,500,000 is to be expended for the care, education, and civilization of the Indians. That $2,500,000 comes out of the interest and trust fund held by the United States for the use and benefit of the Indians. You could only know how that vast sum was to be expended by the bureau by referring to House Document 499 of this session. I expressed the opinion in the committee, and still believe, that it would be much better for the interest of good administration if the items of the expenditure of this $2,500,000 were incorporated in the bill so that every Member of Congress would be able to see and pass on them.

In the paragraph before this there is one of those items that have been so common in the administration of Indian affairs. It appears on page 7, beginning at line 25:

Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for the payment of salaries and expenses of persons employed in the supervision of construction work on school and agency buildings in the Indian Service.

That provision in there is for the purpose of paying a number of men who are for the most part of the time in the Indian Bureau here in Washington, when it is supposed and generally understood that the appropriation for the maintenance of the Indian Bureau is carried in the sundry civil bill.

I want to say further that the conduct of Indian affairs in this country right now is no credit to any good administration of Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the reason why there is not a better and more efficient conduct of Indian affairs in the country is because the Indian Department is honeycombed with a large number of men and women who are in that frame of mind where they believe that a position in the Indian Service provides for them a quiet, easy place, a permanent home where nothing much need be done, a place where they can rest and have easy days and enjoyment for the remainder of their lives. I have visited different Indian agencies, and, for the most part,

I have found men in charge who have nothing in mind toward doing anything for the Indians, who render little service to the Indians or to the Government other than to draw the salaries paid to them. These salaries, it is true, are not very large, but they are too large for many of those who are now receiving them.

I believe the salaries paid in the administration of Indian affairs should be increased so that they will attract better service than is now being given the Government. In my own State, in Oklahoma, in Florida, in Montana, in every State that I have visited, I have found in charge of Indian agencies, in charge of Indian schools men and women who are most incompetent and inefficient to perform the work that should be done by them. These men and women would not be kept for any length of time in any up-to-date educational system. The Indian Bureau has, during the past three or four years, been very active in advertising what it has done. It has been active and spent much valuable time in advertising in the press of the country its claims of accomplishment. I think it has done some good things and made some progress, but its claim of accomplishment would come with more good grace if the bureau would place in the Indian Service more competent men and women who will do some actual, earnest, intelligent work to help and assist the Indians under their care. It is depressing, it is discouraging, to anyone who has at heart the real interest of the Indians, who has at heart the success of Government supervision of the Indians to see the way much of the $11,000,000 we appropriate here is worse than wasted in its expenditure. I trust, if this per capita cost is allowed, that the men and women in the Indian Service will, during the next year at least, cultivate a different frame of mind from what they have shown in the past toward rendering any real, genuine, helpful service to the Indians, and that they will bear in mind that they are in the Government employ to do something for the Indians and not simply to serve themselves by drawing salaries from the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has again expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDUSTRIAL WORK AND CARE OF TIMBER.

For the purposes of preserving living and growing timber on Indian reservations and allotments, and to educate Indians in the proper care of forests; for the employment of suitable persons as matrons to teach Indian women and girls housekeeping and other household duties, for necessary traveling expenses of such matrons, and for furnishing necessary equipments and supplies and renting quarters for them where necessary; for the conducting of experiments on Indian school or agency farms designed to test the possibilities of soil and climate in the cultivation of trees, grains, vegetables, cotton, and fruits, and for the employment of practical farmers and stockmen, in addition to the agency and school farmers now employed; for necessary traveling expenses of such farmers and stockmen and for furnishing necessary equipment and supplies for them; and for superintending and directing farming and stock raising among Indians, $475,000, of which sum not less than $75,000 shall be used for the employment of field matrons: Provided, That the foregoing shall not, as to timber, apply to the Menominee Indian Reservation in Wisconsin: Provided further, That hereafter no money shall be expended for the employment of any farmer or expert farmer at a salary of or in excess of $50 per month, unless he shall first have procured and filed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs a certificate of competency showing that he is a farmer of actual experience and qualified to instruct others in the art of practical agriculture, such certificate to be certified and issued to him by the president or dean of the State agricultural college of the State in which his services are to be rendered, or by the president or dean of the State agricultural college of an adjoining State: Provided, That this provision shall not apply to persons employed in the Indian Service as farmer or expert farmer prior to January 1, 1917: And provided further, That this shall not apply to Indians employed or to be employed as assistant farmer: And provided further, That not to exceed $25,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be used to conduct experiments on Indian school or agency farms to test the possibilities of soil and climate in the cultivation of trees, cotton, grain, vegetables, and fruits: Provided, also, That the amounts paid to matrons, foresters, farmers, physicians, and stockmen herein provided for shall not be included within the limitation on salaries and compensation of employees contained in the act of August 24, 1912.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry of the committee. I desire to know if they have done anything about raising the salaries of the Indian farmers? The information that I have is that the Indian farmers are resigning everywhere, and they can not keep them going at all. Of course, there has always been some doubt as to how much good these Indian farmers actually accomplish, but they are paid only from $720 to $900 a year.

Mr. HAYDEN. The committee has not increased this appropiation in any particular; it carries the same amount and for the same purpose as last year.

Mr. FERRIS. The amount ought to be increased and the standard of service ought to be raised. I have not given it much attention, but I rose to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that to try and hire a man who knows enough about agriculture to teach Indians agriculture and propose to pay him $720 a year for doing it in these times is absolutely a joke. I do not know that the committee has had time to go into it, or that this is the proper way to do that, but I do know that there are three or four vacancies in the Indian farmer office down in my own State and district, and they can not get anyone to take the place; the salary is so small that you can not get anyone to work for it. Either the commissioner or the Secretary ought to appreciate the movement to get a class of men who would know enough to teach the Indians farming. You can not get a man to stand in front of a building to open the door for $60 a month now, and those Indian farmers have a good deal to do other than to teach agriculture. They really have to do with the approval of leases, they have to do with the distribution of the Indian money, and have to do with the approval of the contracts, and the salary is so inadequate for that particular branch of the service that they can not retain anybody in the service who is worth anything.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, on page 10, lines 12, 13, and 14, there is the provision—

And for superintending and directing farming and stock raising among Indians, $475,000.

I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, and also the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON], who is on the Indian Affairs Committee, why it is necessary to have a separate corps of instructors for the Indians? Why do they not apply for these expert farmers and expert stockmen to instruct the Indians to the Department of Agriculture? We have a large corps of instructors and specialists in the Department of Agriculture, who are traveling all over the country and who are doubtless going into the same districts where these Indian agents go, who are paid large sums of money. Why do you not allow all of this to go to the Department of Agriculture, instead of building up in the Indian Service a corps of alleged experts, whom the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] says are not paid sufficiently to produce efficiency? Why is it not economy in a business point of view to use the department devoted to agriculture exclusively for the benefit of the Indians as well as for the benefit of the white farmer?

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman will understand that the area of Indian reservations in the United States is enormous. In my own State there are 23,000,000 acres of Indian lands. In the various counties of Arizona we have agricultural agents, half of whose salary is paid by the Federal Government, and they are always busy giving instruction to white farmers. They have neither the time nor the opportunity to go on the Indian reservations to undertake such additional work. Out of the $475,000 provided for in this item $240,000 has been allotted to this work, and the hearings show that 247 men have been employed as expert farmers to instruct the Indians in agriculture. It is not practical to take the county agents away from their work of instructing the white farmers when they are so few in number and have them do this Indian work also.

Mr. ROBBINS. In addition to the inquiry, which the gentleman has clearly and fully answered, it struck me that to increase the number of exports in the Agricultural Department would be a better plan, and abolish altogether these specialists, and that would procure for the Indians better results.

Mr. HAYDEN. It would be very difficult from an administrative point of view to have a man from the Department of Agriculture working under the superintendent on an Indian reservation. There ought to be one centralized authority directing work which is to be done on each reservation. It seems to me that better work will be done in instructing the Indians in farming by relying on the Indian Service than to depend upon the Department of Agriculture here in Washington, two or three thousand miles away from the reservations.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I will say that I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] that these expert farmers, whom by this appropriation it is intended to have employed for the benefit of the Indians, should receive a fair salary. This provision as it stands will permit the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to give that to those worthy of it. This paragraph does not permit the payment of more than $50 a month to any farmer or expert farmer unless he shall have first procured and filed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs a certificate of competency, showing that he is a farmer of actual experience and qualified to instruct others in the art of practical agriculture; then he may be paid more. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that I believe real expert farmers should be paid more. They should be paid $100, $125, or even $150 a month. The trouble I find on Indian reservations is this, that these so-called expert farmers, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] designated them, are men usually who have made a complete failure of farming. They are a run-down-at-the-heel sort of a class of farmers, who for one reason or another have been taken on by the Indian Bureau to instruct the Indians in the best methods of farming. Time and again as I have visited Indian reservations I have had successful Indian farmers, Indian farmers who have made a real success of farming, complain of these expert farmers, saying that they absolutely knew nothing about good farming and, further, they did nothing toward helping the Indians increase production on the reservations.

Mr. FERRIS. Does not the gentleman agree with me it is almost absolutely impossible to get men for $60 a month and take this responsibility which they have to take? The gentleman knows they have to approve leases, they have to distribute money, they have to approve sales and purchases of horses and harness and construction of houses, and it seems to me in these sort of times, when the purchasing power of a dollar is almost nil, that you can not get these men for this price.

Mr. NORTON. I quite agree with the gentleman. My complaint is this, that the Indian Bureau seems to lack energy, seems to lack common business sense in not itself strenuously protesting against conditions that exist on the Indian reservations of the country. It lacks initiative to go ahead and put into effect a policy that will do away with the incompetents that we now have in the administration of Indian affairs. There would be infinitely more progress made if we had one good, competent man in the place of ten incompetents that we now have in the service. Much of this money is being paid out for these so-called expert farmers, where no benefit at all is being received by the Indians.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does not the gentleman think that the manner in which we employ these experts has something to do with it, to wit, the civil service?

Mr. NORTON. Yes; I think the manner and I think the whole administration of Indian affairs has something to do with it—has all to do with it.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not the gentleman think that the criticism is leveled and ought to be leveled at the head of the department, the responsible authority, the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. NORTON. I want to level it at the Secretary of the Interior, to be specific, and at the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who ought to see that a different policy is pursued. I do not want to camouflage my criticism at all. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBBINS. That is where it ought to be, too.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For witness fees and other legal expenses incurred in suits instituted in behalf of or against Indians involving the question of title to lands allotted to them, or the right of possession of personal property held by them, and in hearings set by the United States local land officers to determine the rights of Indians to public lands, $1,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in the payment of attorneys' fees.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to put a question to the gentleman in charge of this bill. What does the committee mean, page 12, line 9, where it says:

For witness fees and other legal expenses in behalf of or against Indians involving the question of title to lands allotted to them—

And so forth.

What expenses were to be paid out for suits either in behalf or against Indians? Are not the Indians the wards of the Government?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I presume this is in case where a suit is brought to quiet title on behalf of an Indian, or where a suit is sometimes necessary to be brought by one Indian against another. Sometimes there are friendly suits brought and I presume these are friendly suits.

Mr. ROBBINS. The item is not large; I do not wish to raise any further question, but it rather puzzled me——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I admit the language might be a little confusing.

Mr. ROBBINS. Why we should pay costs of that kind.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL EXPENSES OF INDIAN SERVICE.

For pay of special agents, at $2,000 per annum; for traveling and incidental expenses of such special agents, including sleeping-car fare, and a per diem of not to exceed $3.50 in lieu of subsistence, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, when actually employed on duty in the field or ordered to the seat of government; for transportation and incidental expenses of officers and clerks of the Office of Indian Affairs when traveling on official duty; for pay of employees not otherwise provided for; and for other necessary expenses of the Indian Service for which no other appropriation is available, $135,000: Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 of this amount shall be used for continuing the work of the Competency Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of obtaining some information as to what is the progress of the work of this competency commission, for which the appropriation is increased threefold over that carried in last year's bill. Last year the appropriation was $5,000 for the work of this competency commission among the Five Civilized Tribes and the bill carries a threefold larger appropriation of $15,000.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, this appropriation simply provides that not to exceed $15,000 of this amount shall be used for the competency commission in Oklahoma. There was no limitation on the amount that could be used for that commission in any State last year.

Mr. HASTINGS. Five thousand dollars was made immediately available.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Last year $5,000 was made immediately available.

But this proviso here limits the amount that can be used in this State. I will say to the gentleman that one thing that brought this amendment about, as the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] has informed me, was that he found two competency commissions in his home town at one time. The two had met there by accident or in some way. Now, we are very anxious to have a competency commission in Oklahoma that will look to the relieving of the Indian of restrictions on his land when he is competent, and relieving the Government from further supervision of it; but we would not like to have two in the same town, and we thought this might direct the attention of the administrative officers to it, so that we would have one perhaps all the time, and only one, in the State. One is I think amply sufficient for the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee how many commissions have been appointed by the Bureau of Indian Affairs under this former authorization?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There are three.

Mr. STAFFORD. What work are they doing?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They go around to the different Indian communities, and in some instances visit the Indian homes to find out the living conditions in order to get at the Indian's real competency to transact his own business. This is done for the purpose of removing the restrictions and putting competent Indians on their own responsibility as soon as they are capable.

Mr. STAFFORD. What has been the expenditure out of this item in the years past for this work?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I can not give the gentleman that information. This is a step at getting it. Next year I want to bring before the House an itemized statement of money that has been spent for competency commissions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Undoubtedly there was more than $5,000, as provided last year, without any limitation.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There were three working all the time, at about $2,000 to the man, and three men to the commission. And that outside of their traveling expenses when they were away from home.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that would amount to more than $18,000 just for salaries.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Surely. There is more than that being spent now.

Mr. STAFFORD. What was the per diem? Three dollars a day?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Three dollars a day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended five minutes.

Mr. JUUL. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] may proceed for five minutes. He is pursuing a very interesting and valuable investigation.

Mr. JUUL. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] objects, and the question is not debatable.

The Clerk will read.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas may oppose the motion, but the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] made the motion to strike out the last word. However, that motion has just been made, and if he desires to oppose it, the Chair will recognize him for that purpose.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then I oppose the motion.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JUUL. A point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JUUL. I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] There are 41 Members present; not a quorum; and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I call for tellers. I have the right to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's motion was carried.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my point.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman can do it by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. You can not do anything without a quorum.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet and asked for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, but the gentleman's motion was carried and the Chair announced the result of it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Let me make a parliamentary inquiry. When is the time that a man can call for tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair had already announced the result of the vote and had instructed the Clerk to begin to call the roll. Then the gentleman asked for tellers. The Chair will give the gentleman the benefit of the doubt and give him tellers.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] will take their places as tellers. Those who desire to object will first pass through the tellers.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask if the Chair has ascertained whether tellers have been ordered or not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not. The question is on taking this vote by tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] took their places as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 6, noes 46.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee refuses to rise, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having found itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, whereupon 271 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he directed that their names be entered on the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDIAN SERVICE INSPECTORS.

For pay of six Indian Service inspectors, exclusive of one chief inspector, at salaries not to exceed $2,500 per annum and actual traveling and incidental expenses, and not to exceed $3.50 per diem in lieu of subsistence when actually employed on duty in the field, $30,000.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, if one were trying to discover where the most valuable man employed as a special agent or as an inspector in the Indian Service receives his compensation, he would naturally expect that it was either out of the appropriation for the general expenses of the Indian Service, in the paragraph preceding this one, or from the item of $30,000 under this paragraph; but such is not the case. The most valuable man in the Indian Service in inspection work to-day is, in my judgment, unquestionably Maj. James McLaughlin, a man who has been in the Indian Service for nearly 40 years; a man who has made more treaties for the Government with Indians than any other living man; a man who has done more for the Indians of the United States and who is better acquainted with Indian affairs than any other man living in this country to-day.

Maj. McLaughlin receives at this time the modest salary of $2,500 a year, but it is not, I say, as might reasonably be expected, paid out of the appropriation provided for in this paragraph or out of the appropriation provided for in the preceding paragraph.

I like to commend good service in the Government much better than I like to criticize and condemn poor service. It pleases me greatly to recall the efficient and faithful services Maj. McLaughlin has rendered to the administration of Indian affairs during his long period of service with the Government. A man like Maj. McLaughlin, a man who has rendered the real valuable service to the Interior Department that he has rendered for the last 40 years, should justly receive much better compensation than he is now receiving. If we had paid, out of the funds provided for in this and the preceding paragraph, to a few more men of his faithfulness, character, standing, and ability, of his real heart interest in Indians and in Indian affairs, we would have much better service given to the Indians in the different States. We would then have more real development among the Indians, more real improvement in their education and civilization, more real stable and lasting improvement in their ability toward self-support.

Maj. McLaughlin has been employed by the Government in dealing with Indians in almost every State in the Union for the last 40 years. His home and the homes of his children for many years has been on the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the section of the country near where I live. For many years he was the Indian agent on that reservation. To-day he is the most beloved and the most respected man among the Indians in North and South Dakota. His record in the service of the Government is one of which any man could feel justly proud. It is one the emulation of which by others in the Indian Service will bring about much-needed improvement in the administration of Indian affairs. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

I heartily concur in every word that has been said by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

A Member just asked me how long Maj. McLaughlin had been on the pay roll. He was on the pay roll perhaps before some Members here now were born, and during all the time I doubt not he was drawing less salary than he might have been able to draw had he been employed in a different capacity. He is one of the men in the Government service with a capacity of from $6,000 to $10,000 a year who has continued working, year after year, for $2,500, and prior to a few years ago for even less than that. There has never been a man in the Indian Service, so far as I am advised, who has rendered more beneficial service, both for the Federal Government and for the Indians, than has Maj. McLaughlin.

Many years ago, when the last Sioux uprising took place, it was Maj. McLaughlin who took charge of that situation with a firm hand and settled the matter and perhaps relieved the Government from having to kill a great number of Indians. It was necessary to kill Sitting Bull, but if the recommendations of Maj. McLaughlin had been acted upon promptly when the ghost dances first started the life of Sitting Bull might have been saved to a ripe old age, for Maj. McLaughlin notified the Government at the very beginning of the uprising, at the very beginning of the dances, of the dangers to which they might lead. But this Government did not at first take serious enough account of Maj. McLaughlin's report. The result was the death of Sitting Bull, and also the death of one of the brightest, most intelligent, and loyal of our young Indians—loyal to this Government under adverse circumstances. In attempting to arrest Sitting Bull he was also killed.

Maj. McLaughlin has ever been the friend of the Indians, he has ever had the confidence of the Indians. It is worth while for any Member of this House to spend a few evenings reading that very valuable book written by Maj. McLaughlin entitled, "My Friend the Indian."

All praise to Maj. McLaughlin, all honor to this noble, courageous, intelligent, diligent Government inspector, against whose long and valuable public service the tongue of slander has never wagged and who never faltered in the performance of a duty. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I count among my best friends in the public service Maj. McLaughlin, the friend of the Indian. [Applause.] I got my liking for the Indian and my interest in his behalf through association with Maj. McLaughlin. I have read his book, "My Friend the Indian." It is one of the most illuminating works upon the American Indian that has ever been published. It was written by a man who loves the Indians, who has lived with them, and who has worked with and for them. For more than 40 years Maj. McLaughlin's life has been interlocked with the life of the American Indian. Years ago, when uprisings were imminent in any Indian tribe, Maj. McLaughlin, with that courage that his name would indicate, would go to the tribe, would sit with them in their councils, talk with them in their own language, and he has secured many treaties from unfriendly Indians who were about to go upon the warpath which have resulted in the maintenance of peace. He has rendered great service to the Indian and to the United States in the years of his connection with the Indians and with the Interior Department. Maj. McLaughlin is about 76 years young. I do not know where he is now. Perhaps he is out in the Dakotas or in Wyoming. He is somewhere rendering service to the United States and to the Indians. He works like a steam engine. I have known few men who have his capacity for work. At his age he seems never to tire, and he has the faculty of going right to the gist of a question. A few years ago, when a most intricate and important matter was under consideration, Maj. McLaughlin was selected by the Secretary of the Interior and commissioned especially to make an investigation of the entire subject, and the report made by him in that matter is the last word upon the subject. He has always rendered that kind of service to the Government and to the Indians, and I would like to join with my colleagues on both sides of this Chamber in doing something besides merely giving him words of praise. I do not know how he lives on $2,500 a year.

Mr. ROBBINS. Where does he live?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He lives in North Dakota. He knows the Indian, knows his language. This House can well afford to spend a few moments in giving recognition to the splendid services that Maj. McLaughlin has rendered. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

VEHICLES FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

That not to exceed $200,000 of applicable appropriations made herein for the Bureau of Indian Affairs shall be available for the maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of superintendents, farmers, physicians, field matrons, allotting, irrigation, and other employees in the Indian field service: Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 may be used in the purchase of horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, and not to exceed $30,000 for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and that such vehicles shall be used only for official service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. For several years we have been carrying this appropriation and authorization of $30,000, made available for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles. I do not recall how many years that amount has been carried, but I do remember that it has been carried for a number of years. The Indian Service in the field must have at their disposal a number of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles. When this authorization was placed in the bill some years back it was expected that in a short time the amount would be reduced. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether he can furnish any information as to the number of automobiles that have been purchased out of this item in years past, and what is the average number purchased, and the price of the automobiles.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I can not give the gentleman the information for any year except the last fiscal year. For the last fiscal year the only information I can give him is that $40,381.98 is the total from all funds for motor-propelled vehicles.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here is a limitation of $30,000 for that purpose.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I get that information from the hearings on page 96. It is there stated that the total for motor-propelled vehicles, 1917, all funds, was $40,381.98. Paid from tribal and other funds not covered by 1917 act, $22,324.55. Paid from funds and appropriations named in 1917 act, $18,057.43.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I always yield to my colleague from Illinois when he asks a question or takes the floor.

Mr. JUUL. On what page of the hearings is that information found?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. On page 96.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee what is the average price of these automobiles that have been purchased, whether they are the ordinary inexpensive machine, or whether there are instances where some of the higher-priced machines have been purchased?

Mr. FRENCH. Is the gentleman trying to advertise the Ford?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not necessary to advertise the Ford. Mr. Ford himself attends to that.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs said to us in the hearings a year ago that they always purchased the cheapest durable machine, and purchased no high-priced machines at all. Upon being pressed about it, he said he did not want to advertise any certain line of automobiles, but that the automobiles that were purchased were so well advertised as not to need advertisement, either from the administrative or congressional branch of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give the number of automobiles that are in use as compared with the number of horse-drawn vehicles? Of course, everyone realizes that the automobile is a time saver and a money saver, that it makes the time of these Indian agents treble in value what it would be without the use of automobiles. Can the gentleman inform us whether all the branches of the service have been equipped with automobiles, or whether this $30,000 is necessary to extend the automobile service still further?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It is needed, as stated in the hearings, for an extension of the service to some places where the automobile is not now used. The Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs made this statement:

It is now really an economy for the Government to buy a cheap automobile in price rather than to purchase a team, because the machine can be maintained as cheaply as a team, in view of the high cost of feed, and the automobile will not cost any more than a good team.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have obtained as much information as I could from the hearings. I wish I could obtain information as to just how many are in use in the service.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will be very glad to have that included in the hearings next time. I am sorry it was not included this year.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

ISSUING PATENTS IN CERTAIN CASES.

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to issue a patent in fee simple to the duly authorized missionary board or other proper authority of any religious organization engaged in mission or school work on any Indian reservation for such lands thereon as have been heretofore or may hereafter be set apart to and are being used and occupied by such organization for mission or school purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I will ask the chairman of the committee what has been the policy of the committee in the past in the matter of granting patents to sectarian or religious organizations for the land on which they have erected schools or other buildings?

Mr. HAYDEN. I can state to the gentleman that twice before Congress has passed legislation similar to this, saying that where the school grounds were theretofore occupied and used for that purpose patents might be issued. This legislation simply brings it down to date.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think it is a good policy to pursue, as far as the Indians are concerned? Here are religious organizations doing a highly commendable and humanitarian work erecting schools on Government land. A time may come when these schools will no longer be needed, when the land of the Indians will be sold, and yet the Government might, under this authorization, have given title to some portions of the land on which schools are constructed that would interfere with the sale of these lands.

Mr. HAYDEN. On the other hand, missionary societies object to spending money in the construction of buildings unless they have title to the ground, and I think properly so. It is the usual custom to make some reservation in the patent to the effect that if the land is not used for school purposes it reverts to the Indians.

Mr. STAFFORD. Heretofore the Government in its policy has always retained absolute control over the reservation. Here some religious society wishes to establish a school or other educational building on the premises, and the time may come when it might be the wish of the department to exclude those persons from the utilization of this building. It might be that some of the teachers had become obnoxious in their work, and yet under this authorization they would have no right to exclude them from the reservation. I question whether the Government should grant title to land to a religious organization under these conditions, when it might become the means of preventing the department from exercising a free hand late on.

Mr. HAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman that I have never heard of any such difficulty having occurred. We encourage missionary organizations to erect schools on the reservations because of the good they are doing. It is not as though a man were engaged in a gainful occupation, like conducting a store for profit, where his presence might become undesirable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any data as to the number of instances where we have granted title to lands under special acts, or the number of instances where schools have been erected on reservations without title?

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman will look through the statute books he will find numerous instances where legislation has been passed granting title to lands for this purpose. In 1916, and I believe once before, general legislation of this kind was passed providing that where schools had been theretofore established it was within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to grant title to the land. It all lies within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I am always disposed to yield any time at my disposal to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. Is it not a fact that the lands granted to missions and schools to be used for school purposes when not so used revert to the United States?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is the usual reservation in the patent.

Mr. JUUL. Then the country would be perfectly safe in this case.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Arizona stated, in reply to a query, that there is discretion lodged in the Secretary of the Interior. This provision reads:

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to issue a patent in fee simple to the duly authorized missionary board or other proper authority of any religious organization engaged in mission or school work on any Indian reservation for such lands thereon as have been heretofore or may hereafter be set apart to and are being used and occupied by such organization for mission or school purposes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Would it satisfy the gentleman if we struck out the words "and directed" and inserted "in his discretion"?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would not favor allowing this provision to be passed, which would be mandatory. I think there should be some discretion lodged in the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think the gentleman's criticism is proper, and he is at liberty to offer such an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will retain the reservation of the point of order and yield to the gentleman form Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Arizona to the fact that not only is this mandatory but if enacted into law the title is conveyed without another act being performed by anybody. It has been held by the court that when Congress uses such language as this, in this paragraph, the title is actually vested by the legislation in the person or institution to whom or to which the land is to be conveyed. Consequently, if this should be passed, whether the Secretary of the Interior did or did not issue a patent, the actual title to the land would immediately be vested in the institution. I think the point is very well taken.

Now, I would like to ask something further. It has been the policy of the committee in cases like this to specify the reservation, the quality of the land, and the institution to receive it. It may be that in years past there have been instances other than that, but I am not familiar with it. This is blanket legislation. It covers cases not only now existing but in the future. This will remain as a law, and hereafter it will be wholly unnecessary for any religious organization to come to Congress and ask that title be granted to it for the establishment of a church or school. All it will need to do will be to go directly to the Secretary of the Interior, and he is authorized to set aside a quantity of land and issue a patent.

Mr. HAYDEN. In 1916 just such a blanket act was passed, except it provided where the lands had theretofore been occupied for this purpose, and it did not continue hereafter. We thought we might as well make it permanent law at that time. We can do as we did then, take care of the cases intervening in the last two years, by passing this kind of an act.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is unquestioned that wonderful good has been done by these religious organizations, but there are many instances where, unfortunately, there has been some conflict.

For instance, take a spot having 500 Indians and no more, where there may be a Roman Catholic Church established, and which may have been doing splendid work for 30 or 40 or even 50 years. A Protestant Church concludes that it ought to have a mission there, and then they come and get a piece of land, and the result is that the two of them fight for the 500 Indians. That is not right. The Indian is bewildered, and he does not know which church to go to, and the result is that he does not go to either. I know of an instance that occurred recently where there were not more than 250 Indians, where one institution was being conducted with great success. Another one came in, and the result is that neither is now a success. I think some limitation ought to be placed on this. In the case such as I have described, where there is one good church—I do not care what it is, if it is doing good work among a small band of Indians—I never in the world would vote to give the land to another church just because that other church wanted to get in there and proselyte. You can not safely leave that to the Secretary, because the Indian Office did exactly what I complain of. For instance, an agent goes to one of these places and he happens to be a member of a certain church, for illustration, we will say the Baptist Church. He finds there a Methodist mission. He says that the Indians there will go to hell sure if they do not have a Baptist Church and full immersion when baptized. So he goes to work to get a Baptist mission there, with the consequence that both are poorly paid and neither is doing good work. I think this ought to be left as it has been heretofore, and when the committee, knowing the facts, comes to the conclusion that it is a good place to give a deed to a church or a school, let Congress do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], who has had considerable personal acquaintance with conditions on Indian reservations, and because of the fact that the committee also acknowledges that the language ought to be changed, I shall make the point of order that it is new legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the committee will not resist the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ISSUING PATENTS IN CERTAIN CASES.

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to issue a patent in fee simple to the duly authorized missionary board or other proper authority of any religious organization engaged in mission or school work on any Indian reservation for such lands thereon as have been heretofore or may hereafter be set apart to and are being used and occupied by such organization for mission or school purposes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to call the attention of the committee to a situation which I think will perhaps be a means of clearing up a point of interest to a good many Members. I have in my hand a letter from a soldier at Camp Green, who has been in the service for four months, who has not secured as yet one cent of pay, and part of his pay has been assigned to his mother.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment. I dislike very much to object to my good friend discussing the matter he has in mind, and I suggest that he discuss it in the House in a few moments after the committee rises.

Mr. TREADWAY. I did not know what the plan of the committee was, but it strikes me that this is such an important matter that the Indian Committee should not object to having attention called to it. I gladly comply with the gentleman's suggestion and will bring the matter up after the committee rises.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We expect to rise just as soon as we finish Arizona and New Mexico.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, that will require our sitting possibly until 6 o'clock. This is Saturday afternoon.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think we shall quit at 5 o'clock, no matter where we are; but I thought, perhaps, we might finish with Arizona and New Mexico.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 700 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Phoenix, Ariz., and for pay of superintendent, $132,000; for general repairs and improvements, $12,500; in all, $144,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish some information from the committee. What is the reason for all these appropriations for the support of schools being increased over those of prior years? The gentleman stated, in response to a question I addressed to him about the per capita cost being increased to $200 and $225, respectively, that in most instances, if not in all, the per capita cost had been increased and that it was not the primary intention to increase the allowance for per capita cost of these respective institutions, but I find running through the bill that the total appropriations for these different schools have been considerably increased over those of last year. Are those appropriations caused by increased attendance, or is it due entirely to the increase allowed per capita?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman thoroughly misunderstands me. The query the gentleman propounded to me was this. Had we in any case increased the amount in this bill over the estimates of the department?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman misunderstood my query. I am asking now the question, and my query is——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think I understood the gentleman's question. But earlier in the day the gentleman says I made the statement in answer to him that there had been no increase in the per capita cost. On the contrary, the per capita cost was provided to be not exceeding $200 and $225, and in each school as we went along we found it necessary to increase also the per capita allowance, based upon the attendance there last year; not only the number of pupils appropriated for in the former bill, nor upon the number estimated for by the department, but based upon the actual attendance, the enrollment, and upon the capacity of the school.

Mr. STAFFORD. And at what rate per capita?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. For all schools under 400, $200, and for all schools 400 and over, $185.

Mr. STAFFORD. So the gentleman did raise the allowance of those schools above that they were receiving before?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We raised the allowance, that is true; that is to say, we raised the amount allowed at a great many schools. We did that in order that the school might be conducted to meet the requirements of the high cost of living. There is no increase in attendance, but practically all increases in school-support appropriations are increases in per capita cost.

Mr. STAFFORD. Were those increases recommended by the department?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Oh, the department recommended a great deal more than we allowed. In each instance we cut down the department's estimate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Even as to the total amount allowed for the schools?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; even as to the total amount allowed.

Mr. FRENCH. Is it not true that the department had to ask for a deficiency appropriation to take care of the schools last year?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I explained that to the gentleman from Wisconsin—over $250,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. So the committee has proceeded in the amounts of these respective items to allow them a certain amount, as stated, based upon the attendance they estimated in these various schools?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We did this: Where we found their capacity was less than the amount the department asked for in some instances we cut to the capacity of the school. If we found the actual attendance was less, we cut to what was almost the actual attendance last year, providing the capacity would warrant it.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the administration of these various appropriations has the department always utilized the full amount in every case, or are there some instances where money has been turned back in the trust funds or the Treasury?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In most of the cases the allowance has been utilized fully. As the gentleman knows, when the department estimates are made, they are as of date of December 1, but are really made some time before that. Then when the commissioner or bureau chief comes before an appropriating committee, he comes with his justification for each item in the estimate, and in presenting that justification he usually has a balance unexpended in nearly every item. But his statement with reference to a great many of those balances is that they have been contracted for but have not yet been expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction of necessary channels and laterals for the utilization of water in connection with the pumping plant for irrigation purposes and for the installation of additional pumping machinery on the Colorado River Indian Reservation, Ariz., as provided in the act of April 4, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 273), for the purpose of securing an appropriation of water for the irrigation of approximately 150,000 acres of land, and for the conduct of surveys, preparation of plans and estimates for a complete irrigation system to supply the aforesaid area, which plans and estimates shall be embodied in a report with recommendations as to the most feasible and desirable irrigation system, and submitted to Congress prior to December 1, 1918, $80,000, to be immediately available, and for maintaining and operating the pumping plant, canals, and structures, $20,000; in all, $100,000, reimbursable as provided in said act, and to remain available until expended.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read.

I notice there is an authorization here for survey, preparation of plans, and estimates for a complete irrigation system to supply this entire area. A preliminary appropriation of $80,000 is provided for that purpose. I think some explanation should be given as to the total amount that may be required if this is authorized and what is the need for such an authorization at the present time.

Mr. HAYDEN. I can state to the gentleman the facts of the case. There are on the Colorado River Indian Reservation about 150,000 acres of irrigable land. It is the most fertile land on this continent. It will grow enormous crops because of the long growing season. The climate is very similar to that at Yuma in Arizona and the Imperial Valley in California. These lands were withdrawn nearly 50 years ago to form a reservation for the Indians. Unless some effort is made by the Government to divert water from the Colorado River to irrigate the reservation, the total flow of that stream will soon be appropriated at other places, and these Indian lands can not be reclaimed because there will not be enough water in the Colorado River to irrigate all the land that lies along the banks of that stream.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many acres on this reservation are now irrigated and have been utilized by the Indians?

Mr. HAYDEN. The hearings show that at the present time there are actually irrigated 2,432 acres. There is a pumping plant near Parker at present which has a capacity to supply water to about 3,500 acres. That plant has been in operation for sometime, but the Indians themselves took but slight interest in cultivating their lands until of late, when the war prices for cotton and other products induced an increase in the area of the land cultivated by the Indians and the lessees on the reservation.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much of these 2,432 acres are being used by the Indians themselves?

Mr. HAYDEN. Fourteen hundred and twenty-seven acres by the Indians and 1,005 acres are cultivated by lessees.

Mr. STAFFORD. Have the greater portion of the Indians allotments of this irrigated land?

Mr. HAYDEN. There have been allotted to the Indians on the Colorado River Reservation 10 acres to each man, woman, and child.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this new project for the purpose of irrigating additional land, not for the benefit of the Indians primarily, but for the benefit of that part of the public that may go on there and locate?

Mr. HAYDEN. If the entire project is completed a part of it will be reserved for the Indians and the remainder of the land sold to white people to pay the cost of constructing the irrigation works. In other words, the Indians have a very valuable resource which can be utilized provided only that they can connect the water with their land. As matters stand now the land is valueless. If the development of this project is carried out it will make these Indians among the richest in the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman advise the committee what the total cost will amount to in case we launch upon this enlarged project?

Mr. HAYDEN. I can not give the gentleman any accurate information in that regard, because I do not know. I have endeavored during the last four or five years to induce the Indian Office to submit some preliminary estimates, but the commissioner said he desired to look at the reservation himself before doing that. He went out there last summer and came back very enthusiastic, with the result that he has asked for this appropriation. The estimate submitted was for $100,000 for this purpose, but the committee reduced the amount to $80,000, which I think will be sufficient.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course this is merely preliminary, involving only the appropriation for surveys and preparation of plan?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the cost of this project run into millions of dollars?

Mr. HAYDEN. I imagine that the total cost will not be less than three or four million dollars.

Mr. STAFFORD. Out of whose funds will that appropriation be paid?

Mr. HAYDEN. The only feasible way to pay for the project is to charge the construction cost to the lands that are to be irrigated. Because the highest prices are paid for farm products, now is the time to carry out this work. Whether the money should be advanced from the Treasury or whether an irrigation district should be organized and the funds obtained by a bond issue is a matter for consideration when the department submits its report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I question seriously whether this is the time, considering the condition of the Public Treasury, to launch into Indian irrigation projects for the development of arid lands, no matter where located, and particularly if those funds are to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States during the present war. Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. HAYDEN. By doing that the gentleman from Wisconsin will prevent the operation of the existing pumping plant.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection, if it is agreeable to the committee, and no other amendment is offered to use as a handle this authorization for extensive new work, to have the language that has heretofore been incorporated in the bill down to line 17 retained.

Mr. HAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman that if there were funds belonging to these Indians in the Treasury—and there happen to be such funds to the extent of about $55,000—would the gentleman object to the appropriation of these Indian funds for the purpose of carrying on such an investigation as is contemplated?

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, that proposal may permit of the utilization of a mere bagatelle, $55,000, for survey purposes, but the ultimate cost, perhaps amounting to millions of dollars, will fall upon the National Treasury. This is no time for the launching of projects of that kind.

Mr. HAYDEN. Above all others, now is the time when a worthy project of this kind should be launched.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will suggest to the committee, as 5 o'clock is approaching, to have the committee rise. I do not want to do anybody any injustice. I have not examined the hearings on this proposal, and I want between now and Monday to look over the hearings and see whether I would be doing a rash act or not by insisting on the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I have no objection to moving that the committee rise now. Would the gentleman reserve his point of order until Monday?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the point of order instead of making it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8696) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HILLIARD, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Martin O. Larsen, H. R. 15333, Sixty-fourth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

BOARD OF VISITORS, NAVAL ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER. By the act of August 29, 1916, the Speaker is required in the month of January to appoint a visiting committee to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, and it is further provided that in addition to the five Members, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs shall be an ex officio member. Consequently the Chair announces the following as members of the committee: Mr. PADGETT (ex officio chairman), Mr. TALBOTT, Mr. ESTOPINAL, Mr. RIORDAN, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. BROWNING.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday morning. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Oklahoma the reason for that request?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If we meet at 11 o'clock, I think we can finish this bill by Monday night, and the Agricultural bill will be ready to take up on Tuesday at noon.

Mr. GILLETT. We are very busy, most of us, in the mornings, and I think I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

CONSERVATION OF FUEL.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, my object is to read a telegram from a gentleman at Durham, N. C., who was a Confederate soldier, who is one of the great men of our State and a model citizen of our Republic. I do not read the telegram for any political purpose whatever, but to commend the spirit manifested by it to the entire American people. The telegram is as follows:

DURHAM, N. C., January 19, 1918.

Hon. C. M. STEDMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

The Durham Hosiery Mills, a corporation constituting a chain of 10 mills, 3 operated by steam and 7 by hydroelectric power, employing 3,500 hands, have shut down all of our plants, paying our employees in full while the mills are standing, patriotically complying with the request of the Fuel Administrator.

JULIAN S. CARR.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PAY OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a letter from a soldier who entered the service just four months ago to-morrow. In that length of time he has been unable to receive one cent of pay, and the assignment that he made to his mother has not been paid to her. It seems that such a condition as this is deserving of the attention of the department. I took the matter up with the War Department last Monday, but as yet have received no reply to my communication.

The circumstances are these: The young man entered the service by joining a company in my section. He was transferred to another camp. Later the company which he first joined was sent overseas, and the records of his enlistment are with that company. It seems to me strange that in some way duplicates of such important papers as those should not have been left with the department here. I have a letter from the young man this morning saying that the roll has been signed for another month's pay, and that his name is not on that roll. Consequently, it will be at least five months before he receives any pay or before his mother receives the benefit of the assignment which he has made to her. I wish to call this matter to public attention to see if some action can not be secured looking to prompter pay of our men in the service. There are laws regulating time of payment of private corporations, but the Government itself can tie up a soldier's pay for at least four months, and, as this circumstance proves, it will be at least another month before he can get any pay, unless something can be done to cut this red tape. If these records are across the ocean, they ought to have been returned before this. Wherever they are, the men in the service ought not to be held up four months or their families be allowed to suffer because of some kind of department red tape.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Do you know whether this soldier was transferred at his own request?

Mr. TREADWAY. I have no information about that, and I do not think it makes a particle of difference. He is a full-fledged member of a military organization in the service of the Government and entitled to receive his pay monthly.

Mr. GORDON. Was he in a National Guard company or was he drafted?

Mr. TREADWAY. He says:

I have not been paid for about four months. I was with the One hundred and fourth Regiment, which is now overseas, but was transferred into Company H, Sixth Massachusetts Infantry, which company I am now in.

How he got there I do not know, and it does not make any difference.

Mr. GILLETT. That was a National Guard regiment.

Mr. TREADWAY. It was a National Guard regiment.

Mr. GORDON. Maybe he refused to volunteer and was transferred.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, not at all. He is in the service and is entitled to full credit for it as well as prompt pay.

Mr. GORDON. What reason was given for his transfer?

Mr. TREADWAY. I have no particulars as to that. He is a soldier in the service of the United States to-day.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If he was in the National Guard, he must have volunteered.

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly; and it does not make any difference anyway.

Mr. GORDON. Not a bit. He is entitled to his pay, of course; but the gentleman has presented this at the wrong place. He ought to have presented it at the War Department.

Mr. TREADWAY. I did present it at the War Department and have received no satisfaction.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6176. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, January 21, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Quartermaster Corps for "Army quarters, storehouses, etc., Canal Zone, Panama Canal," for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 842), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7230) to amend the postal laws, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 248), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3522) for the relief of the estate of Loyeau Berhel, deceased; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 8652) for the relief of John P. Chesley; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 3940) granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Bryant; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 7524) granting a pension to Robert Dinsmore; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. RAKER: A bill (H. R. 8978) forbidding judges to charge juries with regard to matters of fact, but requiring judges to declare the law, and in jury trials to reduce their charge or instructions to writing on the request of either party; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 8979) to increase the pensions of the blind who served in the War with Mexico, the Civil War, and the War with Spain; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McLEMORE: A bill (H. R. 8980) to provide temporary promotion for retired officers performing active duty during the period of the present war; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SULZER: A bill (H. R. 8981) to provide the full territorial form of government for Alaska; to the Committee on the Territories.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8982) to authorize the leasing of public lands in Alaska for grazing purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. PADGETT: A bill (H. R. 8983) to amend an act approved May 27, 1908 (35 Stats., pp. 417–418), and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8984) for the relief of certain ex-paymasters' clerks; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8985) to authorize the payment of gun pointers and gun captains while temporarily absent from their regular stations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8986) to pay a cash reward to civilian employees of the United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 8987) to preserve the purity of our flag; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LOBECK: A bill (H. R. 8988) creating a bureau of farm colonization to make a national survey of all public lands suitable for farming, to develop, establish, and maintain in a practical manner rural colonies and farm homes for qualified families; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. GARRETT of Texas: A bill (H. R. 8989) providing for the survey of Turtle Bayou, in the State of Texas; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. FESS: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 33) authorizing the printing of 500,000 extra copies of the income-tax primer; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. CARY: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 216) to direct and empower the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to revoke licenses under certain conditions; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. LONDON: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 217) authorizing the appropriation of $100,000,000 to relieve distress among wageworkers; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. SLEMP: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 218) relating to the publishing of presidential utterances; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, joint resolution (H. J. Res. 219) relating to the admittance of newspapers as second-class mail matter containing certain statements; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANTHONY: A bill (H. R. 8990) granting an increase of pension to William Johnson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 8991) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Todd; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.
